

The Haunted Schoolhouse at Newburyport, Mass.

She then pushed the door, with difficulty, and threw the bolt into its place, and at once seized another. But the bolt was pulled sharply back and the door flung open with such violence, that it struck an iron coat-hook and was indented by it.

As these strange doings became known in the community, visitors began to throng the school, and their presence was valuable, for the reason that they were enabled, by their unprejudiced minds, to give a more accurate scrutiny to the incident and character of the disturbance, but no solution was offered in any case, and the presence of an unexplainable force was admitted as proved.

On one memorable day, the teacher, annoyed beyond endurance, exclaimed: "Why do you make such a noise? If you want anything, why don't you ask for it in a proper manner? I am tired out with your behavior!" Silence instantly ensued, and presently several light knocks were mysteriously delivered upon her desk, as if in token of acquiescence. The school was thus left in quiet repose, and the teacher, reassured, resumed her duties. There are two phenomena more impressive than those that have been detailed, and which are as fully attested as the others. One of these is a sweeping attack of epileptic currents upon the building. Several scholars protested at the same time that they were prevented from studying by a rush of air which made their ears sing and their heads ache. The teacher, on investigating the matter, discovered that there was circling rapidly about the room over her head a strong breeze, which was gradually gathering in concentric circles toward the open ventilator, and with a loud rushing noise.

After it had been apparently swallowed in a moment, it resumed its activity, but in the reverse order—that is, the wind circled outwardly from the center, until it reached the limits of the room, when it whirled round and round with great force. All the time there had been no agitation in the air outside; the day was perfectly calm.

Another phenomena, even more extraordinary than this, consists of the illumination of the entry as if by strong sunlight. "The light" is to be seen through the window in partition by all the scholars while sitting in their seats. It is uniform in its strength, and does not appear to proceed from any one particular point. It is naturally more vivid on stormy days when the sky is overcast, and the appearance a prolonged one, lasting at times for hours. On two or three occasions this spectacle has been varied and heightened by a vivid electric glitter, which shoots from one end of the passage to the other, resembling the action of "chain-lightning."

Up to this point the writer has described manifestations of a character (with one exception) which might possibly be accounted for as the results of partially understood, but still natural causes; yet there would still be enough of mystery left to please the most practical. The one exception referred to is the case in which the cellar-door was drawn back. This act seems very clearly to involve an intelligence plus force, and it is of such combinations that people hear and read with the strongest protests.

Besides the disturbances already described, it seems that apparitions of various descriptions have been seen by the scholars. It is these that have made it famous. As long ago as the early part of last spring the pupils of the school began to call the teacher's attention to people who seemed to be standing in the entry. Now and then a child's hand would be raised, saying, with unmistakable conviction: "There is a boy out there." "There is somebody looking in."

These incidents became more and more frequent, but it was a long time before the matter of fact mistress permitted herself to be disturbed by the new form of annoyance. She succeeded for a while in calming and persuading her children, on one pretext and another, and she left no means untried to convince herself that the children beheld were but the reflections of their own fancies in the panes, or the practical jokings of some mischievous child. But her efforts in both directions presently came to naught, for the apparitions were so vivid and graphic, that even her ingenuity failed to account for them.

The most frequent manifestation was the whitish shape of a child's hand and arm, which seemed to be pressed hard against a lower pane of the window in the partition. The figures were slender in shape and waxy in color. At other times the whole arm to the shoulder would be exhibited, and with undeniable distinctness. In all cases the arm was late, and the shape was attenuated. The most terrifying object seen up to the first day of November, was the pale face of a boy, which frequently peered in at the window, and fixed its eyes immovably upon the scholars in their seats.

The appearances became more and more frequent, and there was a corresponding increase of the tumultuous noises and agitations. In the garret there seemed to be a number of men at work hammering, walking about, and now and then dropping their materials and utensils. The sounds of conversation were also clear. There seemed to be three voices—one deep and harsh, another high-pitched and shrill, and a third, soft and complaining. On one occasion only was there an intelligible utterance, and this was coupled with a rather forcible expression—"Hang it, where's my hammer?"
