

THE EVENING NEWS.

LONDON, September 6th.—I have just returned from a visit to the office of the Times, and you will understand that I have accomplished a small undertaking. To visit the offices of American newspapers is no uncommon thing. We should think a person was rather stupid who did not know that the Times is one of our most important journals, but the English press evidently does not like to be looked at in such a way. This is one of the most marked differences between English and American journalism—the difference in accessibility. Had I not been in the company of the editor, I should suppose I should have been taken to a lunatic asylum to-day for innocently asking to see the head of the Times. I am sure my sanity was not doubted. Such madness was never attempted by the natives themselves. A visit to the Times is literally a progression, made up of many steps. First, you must obtain an order from the editor, the paper giving permission to visit the office at an appointed hour. The answer to your application will depend somewhat upon what you make the application. The next step is to find the place, and this is no small matter for the bump of locality even of a London cabby. Premises that London is as crooked as ten pence, and that nobody knows the way, are going to the Times office, and you may realize that the second step in the adventure is so simple that it is almost a truism. A venerable driver had stopped the third time to enquire the way, I ventured to suggest that possibly he had been running too freely, as is often the case with cabmen, and had lost his way. "Not at all," he replied, "these men are not supposed to know where the Times is published." Wonder where they thought the Times came from? He surely could not think it of celestial origin. But in more than one case this ridiculous paper comes from nobody knows where, like the papers of "John Doe," the "Editor," "At last, we have under Temple Bar, mid-views of traitors' heads, swords and keys, and past Legation Hill into Water Lane, and here the cab can go no further. The rest of the way lies through a labyrinth of winding ways, and the driver, finally, emerges from high dark walls into a small, open court, and turning to the left, he enters a door, over which is inscribed the name for which we have been searching. And this is the pilgrimage all people who have ever gone to see the Times have made ever since the year 1774, according to the chronology of our guide. For a century, then, this wonder of the world has been content to abide in the same place, without any regard to modern improvements or outside appearances. Our guide apologized many times for the dingy and old condition of things, as extensive repairs were being made, and I observed that the only object of the repairs was security with not the least suggestion of ornament. I could not help contrasting this with the grand and splendid building of our own palaces of journalism. This, I thought, is a good commentary on the English character. How much the present to the Queen, there is no disposition to move "out of the old house into the new," and such a continued force in one direction acting upon itself.

I was surprised to learn that there are not 10,000 copies of the Times printed daily. The price, doubtless, limits its circulation; it costs three pence per copy, and the other dailies cost but one. It is not an unduly high price, but it is not a general make-up. This reminds me of a new definition of a gentleman I heard the other day. A stranger was inquiring of a tradesman about the people of a certain parish, and was informed that it contained a great many gentlemen, whereupon the stranger asked what was meant by "gentlemen." "Why, sir," was the reply, "as it takes the Times regularly by the year and pays for it." This is, indeed, an enviable reputation. This speaks volumes for the "power of the press," when a newspaper is made the line of demarcation between gentlemen and vulgarians. But I fear the tradesman's definition would not be acceptable to all circles in England.

In the compositor's room we found about 100 types set up, and of them young boys. After the proof has been corrected, each additional mistake is fined a shilling. This rule, though hard upon the poor boys at first, proves an admirable discipline, insuring the greatest care. The process of making the moulds and the casts was the most interesting sight in the building. We witnessed the making of the mould, the molten lead poured into this mould and pressed by a cylinder, to the issuing of the fresh, damp sheets from the press at the rate of 2,000 copies per hour. The press is worked by two twelve horse power engines. The readers' and reporters' rooms are at the top of the building, and the pen-writing which is perpetuated there is beyond computation. The publishing room is the only one that is not a "cave." Here the rush of the news-gatherers for the first chance is so great that the police are necessary to keep the peace. I tried to ascertain the average daily cost of this work, but no one in the building knew anything outside of his own department. I never saw such perfect illustrations of the word "division of labor" as in this building. The larger the city, the deeper the grooves and the harder to get into or out of them.

The employees in the building number about four hundred, and I believe not a word among them. The Times office is the last place in the world in which to look for an experiment thing made, tested and proved to gain admission there. Two telegraphic machines are employed in the office, one communicating with the House of Commons, the other with the Continent for the use of foreign correspondents. As I looked upon the hundreds of bound volumes of the great advocate of Great Britain, I thought of the life of the world for a hundred years just as though a photograph might take a picture of you each day of your life from your birth to your death, and you would see the whole of your life in a single picture. So in a certain sense the Times might be said to be a photograph of the world, and you would see the whole of your life in a single picture. So in a certain sense the Times might be said to be a photograph of the world, and you would see the whole of your life in a single picture.
