GA., December 4, 1896.
I have been traveling through the turpentine lands of the south. I have visited turpentine estates containing hundreds of acres, and have seen thousands of barrels of turpentine gathered for the market. It seems to me that raising turpentine is, in fact, the most important business in the south, and that it takes about a million acres of land to grow the crop and a few years to gather it. Until within a few years the most of our turpentine has come from North and South Carolina. Now the forests of those states have been gutted and the turpentine farmers have come further south, and are to be found at work throughout the forest regions of Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana, and in this region the small turpentine farmer everywhere waded into my notice, making me think that the whole state was engaged in fruit canning, and that the rosin running around the cane burning. Brunswick, where I am writing, is one of the great turpentine and rosin markets of the world. The United States produces, you know, the most of the rosin and turpentine used in the world, and we ship naval stores by the thousands of barrels to the different countries of Europe and Asia. I walked out on the wharves here this afternoon and watched ocean steamers being loaded with barrels of this material for making soap. It goes into many different manufactures, and it makes the middle boats of millions. In the neighborhood of 200,000 barrels of rosin and about 200,000 barrels of turpentine will be shipped from here this year, and about five times these amounts will probably be marketed at Savannah.

A VISIT TO A TURPENTINE FARM.

But let us visit a turpentine farm. There are hundreds of them within a few hours' ride of Brunswick. Each farm consists of thousands of pine trees, and as you look at it you notice that the trees have been chopped and scarred places, running from the roots to about the height of your waist. As you come closer you see that at the foot of each scarred place a hole of box has been cut in the tree, and that the gum or sap is oozing out of the scarred places and running down into this box. The scars or places where the bark and wood are cut off are about a foot wide and from eight to thirty inches long. Some trees have several scarred places upon them, with a box at the foot of each. The size of a turpentine farm is known by the number of the boxes. Ten thousand five hundred boxes make what is known as a crop, but there are farms here which have millions of boxes and upon which hundreds of employees are kept busy cutting the trees and scraping and gathering the gum. The employees are negroes, many of whom are kept busy cutting the trees and scraping and gathering the gum. They are not so wide and about twice as long as the ordinary ax used by wood chopping. Two men always work together, and one must be a right-handed man and the other a left-handed. When the box is finished it is deep enough to hold the sap which it is thought the tree will supply. If the tree is small, only a pint box is made; if large, a box big enough to hold a quart is cut. This work is done in October and November, or even later in the winter. In the spring, when the sap begins to move in the trees, the negroes go about with scrapers and gouge out ridges or scars in the wood above the boxes. The sap begins at once to flow out, and crystal drops from upon the wood and drip down into the box. Every few days the box goes full, and a man comes along with a scap and scoops out the liquid, which is almost as thick as molasses. He carries a box or two with him, and points the sap into this as he goes from tree to tree. When his box is full he empties it into a barrel, and the barrel later on is carried off to the distillery. The trees must be gathered again and again during the summer, and from time to time the negroes go through the farm and scrape down each of the sap at its crystallized stage. In the fall, at the close of the season, or a little later, another set of gashes are made above the old ones to furnish the crop for the next year. The sap for the second year is not so white or transparent as that of the first. It grows darker every year to year, and after six years it is so dark that it is not valuable, and the tree is then about ready to die. The lumber men tell me that the trees are good for lumber after the turpentine has been taken from them, but I find myself in a diversity of opinion on this subject.

In some cases the trees are treated to the turpentine farmer, who pays about $200 per acre, and in others the land is bought outright and the lumber sold after the yield of rosin and turpentine is exhausted.

A TURPENTINE DISTILLERY.

But let us follow the juice of the pine tree and see how it is turned into rosin and turpentine. As it comes from the tree it is of a waxy crystalline nature. The question is to get the turpentine out of it. It will take eight barrels of this mixture to furnish about two barrels of the spirit of turpentine, and what remains will be rosin. The turpentine is gotten out in much the same way that whiskey is made. The distillery consists of a large still, and in the forest at a distance of about a mile from the railroad. The sap is first emptied into a great kettle for boiling which is set into a brick hearth. From this kettle run out at the top and on into a coil or worm. These pipes are to carry out the turpentine vapor. The sap is mixed with water. As the fire heats it a vapor rises and goes off into the pipes. The pipes are so arranged that water flows over them, and as the vapor strikes the water it condenses and is turned back into liquid again. The boiling is continued until what remains in the kettle has grown so thick as molasses and quite as brown as the cheapest of the New Orleans variety. This is taken out and put into barrels. It is rosin, and as it leaves the distillery it is ready for shipment to the market. There are different qualities of rosin, according to the character of the sap from which it is made and to the time of the year at which the sap is gathered.

GEORGIA FIRE.

The Georgia pine forests are fast being cut away. There are big saw mills here and at different points throughout the lumber region. I visited yesterday a cypress mill, which ships vast quantities of shingles all over the north, and in which the great cypress logs are carried by machinery at one end and come out at the other at the shape of finished boards and shingles. The saws, which work like a band of matter and cut their way straight through the logs with hardly a second's cessation. They cut faster than the saws which are so largely used in the northern lumber regions, and are the latest improvement in the saw line. The fact that labor is cheap does not lead them to use the old methods and the men who expect to sell old machinery to the south will fail.

A great quantity of Georgia cypress is now being gotten out. Much of it of the future will come from the Okefenokee swamp, which is now being reclaimed. This swamp is with the probable exception of the Florida swamp, the largest in the United States. It is a vast quantity of good timber, and when the present improvements are completed it will be one of the most valuable agricultural parts of the state. Today it is to a large extent a terra incognita. Some parts of it are as dense as the jungles of India. It is filled with cypress, and there are alligators by thousands in the water. The swamp is so low that it is so rich that the forest crops of cotton, sugarcane and rice can be grown, and there are indications that sugar cane below the surface of the swamp there are immense coal beds. The timber will be one of the most valuable products of this region, and it will probably soon be thrown upon the market.

HOW LUMBER IS SHIPPED.

At present the lumber of Georgia is one of the most valuable properties of the state. The long-leafed pine, or Georgia yellow pine, still holds its own in the market of dollars, and the lumber furnishes the bulk of the freight carried by many of the railroads. Many of the lumber men are getting rich by buying these forests and shipping timber to the north. They buy the woods by the thousands of acres and then build railroads to get the timber out. Their agents first go through the country and have options on the property they want. If they find a man who will not sell them a right of way through it, which he does, thinking sooner or later they will be obliged to purchase at his price. After they have gotten out their own timber, they tell the man that if he does not come to terms they will take up the railroad. In some cases he refuses, and I am told that such roads have been torn up, leaving a man with a small lot of timber a long distance from any line of railroad. Much of the timber comes here in the winter when the rivers are high by the early spring rains. The southern lumber men have not the advantage of the snow over which to draw the logs, as is the custom in the north. The logs are either dragged by ox teams or raised up between the wheels of a custom wagon which is used in lumbering here and then hauled under the axle of the wagon to the stream.

OR, BETTER, (GIVEN OUT).

It is hard to realize how fast the lumber of the United States is being consumed. It is true that the great majority of Europe has some idea for the preservation of its forests. We have practically no such idea. We have practically no idea that some of the states have passed laws for the preservation of forests, and a small amount of forests has been set aside by the national government. These reservations are, however, comparatively small, and the probability is that we will at no very distant day be in the midst of a lumber famine. It is safe to say that there are about 20,000 people employed in lumbering today. We sold lumber to the amount of $100,000,000 in 1895, and the product of lumber of that year was estimated at $100,000,000 collected. This would make a solid beam a foot square, more than a square mile long, or long enough to make a solid road say there than 200 feet wide and a foot thick clear round the world.

At present the best timber of the north, namely, the white pine of the northwestern and New England pine, is practically gone, and everywhere I have traveled in the north I find the lumber men by hundreds at work. Our average loss of lumber by fire annually amounts to more than $100,000,000. Some years it is more than double this, and in 1894 more than 100,000 acres of forests were burned and more than $20,000,000 worth of lumber was destroyed.

OF AMERICAN LUMBER TRADE.

Our foreign lumber trade is increasing enormously. We sent $100,000,000 worth of wood to Canada and England last year. The chief foreign demand now seems to be for southern pine, and great quantities of it are being shipped to Germany and England. Our turpentine trade everywhere, and a great deal of lumber is used for making furniture. There are 20,000 establishments in Michigan which manufacture the products of the saw mills, and that state turns out more than 20,000,000 worth of furniture every year. West Virginia is developing a large wood pulp business, and the southern states now compete with the red cedar shingles of the Pacific coast. An enormous amount of lumber is used by the railroads, more than 100,000,000 cubic feet being annually taken for ties, etc. Five hundred cubic feet are used yearly for fences, and we consume here the enormous amount of 10,000,000,000 cubic feet annually. The most of the mines of the United States have to be timbered, and 150,000,000 cubic feet are used by our coal, iron and gold and silver regions, while 250,000,000 cubic feet are burned to make charcoal. In addition to this there are little businesses that need up a great deal of wood. A toothpick is not large, but the aggregate amount used by the 50,000,000 people of the United States requires many bays. There is a single factory in Michigan which makes 7,000,000 toothpicks every day. The material used is white birch, and the logs are sawed up into strips twenty-eight inches long and the machines run these out into toothpicks at the rate of hundreds a minute.

CAUSE SAME RESULTS.

I had the chain gang cutters all used in Georgia. I saw convicts at work breaking stone in Maconburg, N. C., and I am told that the system prevails generally in the states of the south. Georgia has passed laws which will send it away with the leasing out of the convicts, but at present not only the state convicts, but those of some of the poorer farms, near here, a man who has some new ideas as to the use of convict labor. He is employing the prisoners of the county in the cultivation of an experimental poor farm, upon which he is raising calabashes and other vegetables for the northern markets. He is now planting his calabashes and he has already one hundred calabashes and plants in the ground. It chattering with him about the working of the farm he told me that the prisoners worked in chains, and upon my asking him whether there were no additional guards to keep them in order, he replied:

"Yes, we have white men with policemen's clubs to watch over the different gangs. Our prisoners are not hard to control, and they do not often get away from us."

"But, captain, suppose they escape, how do you watch them?" I asked. "We start the hounds after them, and they soon get to their heels. I have seven bloodhounds on my farm, any one of which will track a negro for twenty miles. It is a man escapes we give the dogs a piece of his clothing to smell and put them on the track. They will at once start off, running along the heels of the negro to the ground. One or two officers follow on horseback, and we keep them in order, he replied."

"If it is," was the reply, "the negroes know that they are almost sure to be caught."

"Do the dogs hurt them?" I asked. "They do as if they can hurt them, but the most cruel thing, and that is what we get out of them. As soon as a dog has found his man, it is a case of death, and we come up."

"Where do you get such dogs, captain?" I asked. "We train them," was the reply. "We begin when they are pups. We have negroes to train them. They steal their meat and butcher the pigs when they are eating. The dogs soon get to hate them, and after a time, we have the training out and send the dogs after him. Then we take a piece of the coat of the negro who has been doing the training and let the pup smell it and put him on the negro's trail. It does not take long for the pup to understand what we want. He will run after the negro for a short distance, but the next day he will go faster, and after a short time, we find that the dog has caught on and will follow any man he is sent after, colored or white. It is wonderful the quickness with which such hounds display. I have had pups which would follow a negro across one stream, after another, taking up the trail on the opposite bank and finally picking out the man from a crowd of civilians and hanging onto his pantaloons leg until I came up."

H. M. Blount, senior member of H. M. Blount & Co., 217 N. 2d St., St. Louis, writes: I had been told with a very disarming smile, the result of influence, which nothing seemed to move, until I took Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. One bottle completely cured me. I sent one bottle to my sister, who had a severe cough, and she experienced immediate relief. I always recommend this syrup to my friends.

John Cranston, 1011 Hampshire street, Quincy, Ill., writes: I have found Dr. Williams' Pink Pills superior to any other cough medicine I ever have known. It never stops.
