substance: serve them right.

Is there a genuine philanthropis who takes in the situation of affairs here, and appreciates the amount of suffering entailed upon women and children by the crusade against the Saints? Does he desire to alleviate the afflictions of the distressed? If there is, it appears to us that his efforts will be directed towards checking the manufacture of misery rather than wasting en ergy in attempts to alleviate it after i or Republicanism will, if necessary, is evolved. It is a shame that this great government should, through a few of its officers, be transformed into a factory for the production of human distress. Genuine and intellectually directed effort would endeavor, so far as practicable, to dispense with such institutions as the Industrial Home. Those who seek to alleviate suffering by such institutions |without attempting to stem the tide of its production are in the position of a physician who allows disease to make ghastly inroads upon the physique of his patient and then applies nostrums in the form of a cure almost as disastrous as the complaint Proper and intelligent endeavor would this city alone, some hundreds of be to give such an institution as the alleged Home as little necessity for existence as possible. The question arises as to the feasibility of such philanthropic effort. For the sake of argument the position of one who wishes to see polygamy abolished may be safely reasoned from in support of the practicability of curtailing the production of suffering without diminishing the prospect of the attainment of the primary end. Here comes a case in point: James

I. Steele, aged somewhere about seventy years, was before the Third District Court this morning to receive sentence for unlawful cohabitation. He had given the officers no trouble, having straightforwardly acknowledged his marital relationships. This fact was represented to Chief Justice Zane-a mission judge-both by Mr. Varian, the attorney for the prosecution, and Mr. Moyle, for the defense. The representation was made in the hope that the judge would be merciful. Their efforts were of no avail. The Coart drove the veteran into a corner to compel him to "promise to obey the girls for any purpose are liable to law as construed by the Courts." He could not conscientiously make the covenant, which he believed to amount to a repudiation of his wives. He had employment, to avoid hotels and boardmarried his plural wife in 1854 and had ing houses. At such places they may lived with both since that time. His earn better wages than elsewhere, but case was a segregated one, the indictment containing two counts. On each of these counts he received the full them.
