A SEASONABLE PHILAN-THROPIST.

What does he do when sidewalks glare, And every brick seems but a snare To eatch the passer unaware? He spreads his ashes.

And when down town we creeping go, And trembling tread, a tottering row, With honest features all aglow, He spreads his ashes.

Long may he live, that man of soul! Filled be his bin with red ash coal, Till halos crown his saintly poll, Who spreads his ashes.

And when he leaves this world of slides, And with grim death serenely glides, May this be heard, and naught besides-"Peace to his ashes." -Hartford Times.

Four Days in a Snow Drift.

horrible sufferings of a party in a recent Northwest snow storm. They had started out on a journey of twenty-five miles to Wilmer, and quite early in the afternoon it began to snow, but they passed on. Soon the snow grew intense, and great drifts prevented their advance. Setting up the box of one of the sleighs as a protection against the wind, without food, and very few blankets, they huddled together until the snow would pass over. Thus passed Tuesday night. The next morning, one of them started for a house about a mile distant after trying to persuade the others to accompany him. They considered it safer where they were. He started off, and reached Meagher's with both hands frozen. The storm continued so severe that no attempt could be made to rescue the others at that time. They, in the meantime, were suffering all the pangs of cold and hunger, and it is quite probable that several of them became delirious, for when found they were lying out of and near the shelter. About 10 o'clock on Friday morning, a man passing along the road with an ox team, heard shouts as of some one in distress, and upon making search discovered the little barricade covered with packed snow, and was horrified, upon disturbing several apparent knolls in the vicinity, to find that they conthe bedies of men. He BEDDING found the bodies of Thos. Holden, Steuben O'Neil, and John O'Neil, the first two quite dead, and the latter with life almost extinct. Upon searching under the cover, he discovered two feet protruding from the snow, and breaking away the crust he found Charles O'Neil alive, but in a terrible condition. The bodies were at once lugged to his sled and conveyed to Meagher's and thence to Wilmer, John O'Neil dying before reaching that place. The details of the suffering of Charles O'Neil are horrifying Charles O'Neil are horrifying and almost incredible. It seems that he had lain down, immediately upon entering the cover, and had, while in this position, been fastened down by the terrible weight of the LATEST STYLES snow which drifted upon him, or rather the upper portion of his body. It was so heavy, he said, as to cause almost unbearable torture. After he found that he was unable to rise, and that the snow was covering his head, he feared suffocation, and to keep that member free constantly raised and lowered it, and in this manner, while he could not prevent the drift from forming over it, he formed an air chamber, which prevented suffocation. In his endeavor to free his head, the poor fellow actually tore the hair almost entirely from the scalp. Here he lay, with his feet exposed to the air frozen stiff, and the cruel frost creeping up his limbs, and unable to move scarcely a muscle of his body, from Tuesday night until nearly Friday noon. Can a more horrible situation be imagined? The poor fellow's right arm is frozen to the elbow, the right leg to the knee, and the left leg above the Cahinet completely dead, and he has been lying at Wilmer until yesterday, when the first train succeeded in getting through. Five of the horses were frozen to death, and the others were found five miles away, all right.

The San Francisco Reat Estate Circular says: Only seven persons were driven to the refuge of suicide in January by the ear splitting notes of the calliope of the steamer S. M. Whipple, against ten in December. This falling off has rendered the captain quite melancholy. He promises to crack on more steam this month, and either give rejoicing coroners a dozen victims or burst a boiler,
