The language of the law in respect to this portion of the oath is "that he will not, directly or indirectly, aid or abet, counsel or advise any other 'person to commit those crimes." What crimes? The "crimes in said act" are adultery, fornication, incest, polygamy and unlawful cohabitation. The promise in regard to these is that he will not commit them nor aid or advise any other person to commit them. In order to break this promise he must either commit one of these crimes himself or help or counsel some other individual to do so. If one who had taken the oath should be called in question for not having observed his agreement, it would have to be shown that he had broken the law since taking the oath, or that he had aided or advised some other person, who, with the alleged offence, would have to be designated, to actually commit one of the crimes named in the law. In fact he must, by some overt act, bring himself a within the penalties of the law or it cannot be legally declared that he has violated his oath. Every man has the constitutional right to pronounce the laws of 1882 and 1887 or any other laws wrong in principle and subversive of personal liberty. He has also the same right to declare, publicly and privately, his views as to the rightfulness of practices that a law condemns. Slavery is now prohibited by law. It is condemned by legislative enactment and by public sentiment, and the controversy as to its practice has been settled by the arbitrament of war, Yet any man who still believes it right official grave. may declare his convictions and contend that the law is wrong.
