AT S. P. TEASDEL'S!

house-length to the right and left. The yard-wide pavements are series of stone stairs and platforms. Beneath the latter are shadowy shops and living rooms. All stand open. But few inhabitants are to be seen. Up, up, up, for a half mile, you plod, and at last reach a tiny open space. The houses are set around it closely. Quaint shops and ancient inns crowd it at all sorts of curious angles. This is the head of the village, topographically, in habitations and in aristocracy.

Not for its attractiveness, but because it seems an outlet to somewhere, you pass into a little court behind the Black Bull Inn. It is a mass of angles and wynds. Suddenly another tiny open space confronts you. Here are an old, oblong, two-storied stone house, with a few yards of grass-plot at its side, a little stone church, attached to, rather than blended with, a grim Norman tower; a grave-yard cluttered with crumbling stone, the whole barely covering an acre of ground. These were the worth parsonage, church and church-yard; the earthly, and final, home of the Brontes; and their lonely moors ever rested on Haworth moor, which rises immediately above the church-yard like a wall of rounded stone.

Come to such as these in the summer time only. Then dewy clouds straggle over and between the hills as if shadowy boats were marshalling behind the horizon. Here and there splotches of color in against old walls and house fronts. The heather blushes from the undulant green of the moors. And one can then easily imagine lots of Anglian pastoral scenery here in the shepherds and their flocks, like cameo reliefs on beds of dazzling emerald, with a perspective of hollowy lines and misty clouds.

Over here in Northamptonshire, just at the edge of the garden shire of Warwick is ancient moss-grown Crick, sleeping under its thatches beside Watling Street, most famous of Roman roads. There are both rest and delight in old, old Crick; rest, because it is one of those English villages which stands not as it always stood—where the roar of the workaday world's activities never comes; where the old parish church, the grave-yard, the decayed manor-houses, the huge stone dovecotes which house ten families of doves, the thatched farm laborers' cottages, the inns and moss walls, and the simple village folk, all invite to quiet and repose.

Not ten miles away you suddenly come upon the daintiest and most flower spangled village in England. It is a tiny collection of dependencies upon the manor at Ashby St. Ledgers, but there can nowhere else be found such flower embowered houses. Just at the northern edge of this, the manor forming a striking background to the side bravery of one of the finest wide, high overarchings of ancient ash trees I have ever seen. Set square a huge wall, high, thick, ivy hung and moss. Surrounding this is a wonderfully perse-vering and patchwork affair of stories of chambers and an attic—the veritable meeting room of the conspirators in the noted Guy Fawkes Gunpowder Plot of 1605—over a capacious archway, which formed the ancient sole entrance to the domain. Behind this are other towers and outbuildings, half a thousand years old and in perfect maze. To the right and higher, shows a grim, square Norman tower and the mossy roof of the parish church. Behind and above all are the many massive gables of this most splendidly fantastic manor house within the England midland shires. How glorious an historic romance could be wrought within Ashby St. Ledgers' grim and ghostly old walls!

In the western and western midland shires of England are scenes of ancient villages of romantic and beauty, hidden away from the globe-trotters' beaten routes in the many hollows of the verdant hills. Old Broadways—"Broadways" it once was, from the shepherds' custom on its mossy seats down to the most humble sale of Evesham"—is a lovely type of them all. All its houses are picturesque. Indeed, here is one of the few ancient stone built villages of olden England, but generally as its makers built it all the way from ten to two years ago. On every side are high pitched gabled roofs, with mullioned stone and iron lights, casemented windows and bays, leaded casements containing the original glass, and huge, tall, stone chimney stacks—all scattered to most beautiful effect.

Low stone walls in front enclose little old world gardens, box clipped and peculiar shaped yew trees. Occasional of hawthorn shrubbs in bits of detail, all old doors and hinges, old glass and casement fastenings and most curious chimney pieces, classic ceilings and paneled rooms. Every house has diamonded, emblazoned windows, with numerous wood hinges and huge locks of oak, roughly squared and modified over the angles and fireplaces. In these snug old inns and in half the huge stone farmhouses round about, tradition will tell you, Charles I. or Elizabeth passed a night. How true of them so far as it they had the fastens, time and will.
