Clubwomen in general, and members of the Mothers' congress in particular, will be interested in the following clipping from a Washington, D. C., paper:

It is an announcement of uncommon interest to women generally and especially to the constantly widening and inclusive circle of those who have the training of the children and the betterment of child conditions at heart, that President Roosevelt has accepted the request of the National Congress of Mothers to deliver an address before the coming convention of the congress in Washington. This will be, it is stated, the first time that the chief executive of the nation has delivered a formal address before a gathering of women only, and their success is something naturally on which the National Congress of Mothers are felicitating themselves. In order to assure the presence of the president, it appears, it has been necessary to hold the event a little earlier than planned, the date being fixed for the week from March 10 to 17, and the president's address to be given March 13. The subject of the chief executive's discourse at this happy event has not been intimated as yet, it seems; but in view of his well known ideas in the line of the society's propaganda, it is not difficult to hazard a guess as to the trend of his utterances on the notable occasion when he faces for the first time in his official character an assembly chiefly composed of mothers and homemakers. Another noteworthy feature of the coming congress, and one that is indicative of the broad outlook of the leaders, is the observance for the first time of an "international day," when the ambassadors of foreign nations will speak on the subject of childhood conditions in their respective countries. Another day, it should be noted, is to be appropriately given to the consideration of moral and religious training in the home, with eminent prelates and leaders as speakers.

Massachusetts clubwomen are showing commendable interest in the arts and crafts movement, a movement which made its American debut in the Bay state. The state federation president also is chairman of the organization's committee on arts and crafts. Among the occupations studied by the clubwomen are rug and mat making, basketry, beadwork, sewing, knitting and embroidery, as well as the requirements of artistic articles of furniture. Above all things else, the endeavor is being made to impress upon the club members, and through them upon the community at large, the truth which Millet expresses in these words, "The suitable is the beautiful."

It is generally conceded that Massachusetts has the best child labor laws of any state in the Union. New York takes second place and Illinois, Wisconsin and Colorado, whose laws on this question, are similar, rank next.

day and have taken up their residence at the Methodist parsonage.

Miss Ethel Adamson has returned home, after an extended visit with Salt Lake relatives.

Wm. A. Matson and C. E. Hulsh will attend the convention of the Woodmen of the World at Mt. Pleasant on Wednesday next.

The Twentieth Century circle, Women of Woodcraft, are making preparations to give a grand ball some time this month.

Nordica Says Work is the Keystone to Real Success.

MME. LILIAN NORDICA, the highest salaried star in the Conried Metropolitan Opera company's organization, and that means one of the highest salaried operatic stars in the world, was asked not long since to what she attributed the commanding position she has attained. Her reply was:

"Nothing but work. Life has no other real, great pleasure for me but work in my profession. I have known nothing else. I can appreciate nothing else. I want nothing else."

"I selected an occupation that one must wed one's self to if success is to be obtained. A prima donna's life, if she is true to herself, is the hardest occupation that can be found."

"It's hard not only mentally, but physically. There is no digger of streets, no farm laborer, no coal heaver who works harder than I do. It is not a life of luxury and ease, of idling and dreamy hours. It is a life of strenuous endeavor and persistent application."

"One must train and keep in training just as prize athletes do. The moment that training, that endeavor, is stopped, then you begin to retrograde. When I am not singing I am studying. The vocal mechanism must ever be by one's side."

"Did you find it hard to sing Kundry and Gioconda within one week's time?"

"Hard work naturally. They are two very heavy roles and both of them new to me. That I was able to sing them within four days and apparently with good results is due to the fact that my voice has been kept in training. Also the roles and the music are very, very different. But it is well to remember that one's voice is only an instrument. Violinists spend years and years in practice to get that certain beautiful tone and then there is no reason why a singer should not use it in one role as well as another."

"A violinist is not limited to a certain theme. Neither is a prima donna limited to a certain opera. When her voice is sufficiently trained she has no limits. So, you see, Kundry and Gioconda are not impossible even with only four days intermission and comparatively short preparation."

"There is a mental, physical and nervous strain in learning a new opera. Memorizing the music and the words is no small task. Then standing on your feet much of the time for three or four hours at a stretch is enough to try the endurance of a strong man, much more a woman."

"And nervousness is something that you cannot get away from. It will come. There is the audience looking at and listening to you. That of itself is enough to set the nerves a-tingle. Take 'Tristan and Isolde' for instance. One day never know, I can never tell, what it feels like to lie on that couch and hear the prelude progressing bar after bar. And then the sign given for the curtain to go up. That is the awful moment."

"I wonder if anyone but a singer can realize what it is to sing a strange role in a strange language."

"But a still greater force that gets on your nerves is your wish to do your best. That's the annoying part of it. No matter how much you try, no matter how well prepared you are, you feel afterwards that you were not quite up to what you anticipated."

"Is that always true? Did you never sing at your best in public?"

"Perhaps that statement is a little sweeping. Once or twice I have gone home saying to myself, 'Lily, you couldn't have sung it better.' But those are very rare occasions, and even then I was probably fooling myself."

"However we have to pay the price of the tension. It takes at least a day for the re-action to set in, and then nature demands the penalty of the strain. I have been in bed all day today, not that I am ill in any way, but that the irritable tired feeling came to which I was forced to surrender."

Mme Nordica will be heard here in the Tabernacle on the evening of April 4 in Rossini's Stabat Mater. Assisting her will be three other great stars, Homer, Dippel and Journet, and assisting the four will be the splendid Conried Metropolitan opera chorus and the orchestra of 29 soloists. The Stabat Mater will form the second part of the program. The first part will be made up of arias by Allen and DeMacchi and choral and orchestral selections.

The seat sale is now in progress at the music store of the Carntensen & Ansen company and conference rates will be in effect on all railroads.
