Intending to collect them. The day shortly atterward (says one of the brothers) an aged man empired the office, saying he had come to pay an old debt. He was from Cape Cod, and his bowed form, and humble dress, and haid hands indicated that his life had been one of struggles and sorrows. My brother (says the narrator) furned to his deak, and found the old man's name on the "forgiven list." "Your note is outlawed," said ve; "it was dated 12 years ago, payable in two years. No interest has ever been paid; you are not bound to pay this note. We can never recover the amount." All male inhabitants of the town who were over 21 years of sge, were to vote, and each, the town town who were over 21 years of age, were to vote, and each, the town officials and the poorest artisan allke had one ballot.

The organ-builder seemed too agltated to answer the questions that the town official askel him, but led the way quickly to the organ-loft. "Put your foot on that pedal!" he said, excitedly, pointing to a partic-ular one of the scale. The money was put up, the crowd fell back, and the farmer's face wore a smile of triumph as he still further excited the dog, and then slipped his collar. "It does not sound," said the organ-builder. "Follow me and I will show you why."

"It never has sounded since the great trial-day, years ago," muttered the young man. But he followed on.

I should not be able to give, in detail, the progress of the trial, for the history of the affair is not minute enough for that. But suffice it to say, that the last name on the list was Raoul Tegot; and the name im-mediately preceding it was that of Baptiste Lacombe. After the first moment of surprise had passed, they began to get back their wits; and the young man ad-vised that they send for several strong men and lift out the p'pe. This seemed sensible, and in a half hour the men were at hand and the pipe was drawn down to the level of the organ loft and laid hori-zontally. The people came back to their prosaic selves again, looked in each other's faces, and all were under intense excite-ment. The pipe was very long, and the body was at least five feet from the top. One of the workmen reach-ed in a pole having a hook at the end, and the next minute drew forth the dead body of the sinister old organist Baptiste La ombe. A Boston merchant, dying, left among his papers a parcel of unpaid bills against poor debtors, with a written suggestion to his sons that, perhaps, the claims might as well be destroyed, as collecting them would undoubtedly cause distress. The young men made a careful schedule of the claims, and placed a large proportion of the debtors" names on the "forgiven list"-never intending to collect them.
