SEARCHING FOR A HUSBAND.

And so the ship sailed on, the time flying by. So pleasantly did it pass that we were well down south and across the southeast trades before any one began to talk of getting to the Cape. The weather kept fine, the evening promenades were continued, as well as the dining and Mr. Armstrong was invariably the companion of Miss Bellamy. In short, it was with him, the old story; he had played with edged tools and cut his fingers.

One night I was keeping the first watch, walking fore and aft the poop, when he came up and turned about with me. I thought I'd rally him.

"Well, Armstrong, so you're in for it at last?"

"Pooh! nonsense!" returned he, turning as red as a crimson sunset.

"It is useless your trying to deceive me, man—and perhaps, yourself, also. I see it all plainly."

"Well, upon my word, I believe it is as you say, old fellow," he acknowledged, coming round. "I can't help myself."

"Now, Armstrong, look here—take a fool's advice. Don't let the fancy go on. Get out of it while you can. Depend upon it, you will only be wasting your time and love upon her. She is a charming girl; I believe a truly good girl; but she knows how to take the best care of herself. She is going out to India, as her story did before her, to find a rich husband!"

"You know her people, don't you?"

"Yes, I know them. And I know the crowd they belong to. Miss Bellamy will never look seriously on a poor man like you."

"I suppose you're right," he said, after a pause. "I have thought all along that she was only amusing herself with me. It's true she attracts a man against his will. But I'll cut the matter short for tonight."

Toward morning the weather changed. The wind hauled into the southeast, and came on to blow. For two days we had a strong gale with a heavy cross sea, and the ship was knocked about a good deal. The few who could remain about, as usual. He seemed to be keeping to his determination, for he did not appear to her more than common civility demanded, and when in the cabin, as days passed himself at a safe distance.

But this could not last. The ice in George Armstrong's heart melted, his good resolve gave way. When fine weather returned, and the evening walks were resumed, he and Miss Bellamy were again promading the poop side by side. And all the time, as she smiled? Not one bit, then I could detect; and I watched her closely. I felt sure that I had taken her true estimate; she was of the world, worldly. Some two months after leaving England, we made the Cape. The weather was fine, and the ship put into Table Bay. Outrigger for water, fresh meat and vegetables in reality, to afford the passengers an opportunity of seeing the place and having a run on shore. They had great fun, I only wish I had been with them; but we had sprung a topmast and sustained some other damage shortly before, and I had to remain on board to look after the sailing. Table Bay was left after a storm of two days. The weather was fine, and the wind southerly, a light breeze. The next day but one, the ship was on her way, and most of the passengers assembled on the poop, some of the men began fishing over the side for Cape pigeons and other small game. I was going about five knots, with the wind broad on. I stood looking out at the fishing and then went forward to the forecastle ladder, when there was a loud cry from the helmsman.

"Man overboard!"

Of all the different calls on board ship in moments of sudden danger this, to me, the most startling and impressive. It sends the crew into a panic, and imparts a feeling of indescribable dread and gloom that no other cry does. I have, unfortunately, heard it often. I have also heard it uttered on the ocean, from "Redoubt," which I was on, and it impressed me as that of "Man overboard."

"Man overboard!" How instantaneous the cry came, and how it seemed to be by twenty voices! What a state of panic and confusion the passengers were in! All the crew came on deck in an instant; even they who had been in their bunks.

"Where?" I cried, bounding back to the poop, and running aft. "Who is it?"

"Armstrong, Mr. Armstrong,"

"Hark down the helm," I bellowed, and threw it as far as I could toward where he was paddling about in the water, a hundred and fifty yards away. Although the breeze was not strong, strange to say, nobody had thought of throwing one overboard. The one I threw did not go thirty yards from the ship.

"Hark down the helm," I bellowed, and let go the mainmast and foremast, main-sheet, back the main yard. Mr. Green, take the helm with you and clear away the small dingy into the harbor and lower away as soon as you're ready. Jump up in the mainmast, and keep your eye on the man overboard. In a very short time the ship stopped, and the boat traveling as fast as four good men could pull her toward the place where Armstrong could be seen from above. Mr. Green, fortunately, he had not released the lifebuoy. It was now a question of how long he could keep up. The weather was fine, and the water comparatively smooth. But—could he swim well? None of us knew!

It was a most anxious time. The suspense was terrible. Most of the passengers, certainly all the ladies, were literally in a panic. The man overboard human life. Presently, I saw the boat from the mainmast. "It's all right, the boat has him. They are pulling straight for him! A minute or two later, the boat came alongside and on the deck, very much to my astonishment, for I had not seen him come down.
