TREASURE ISLAND.

When Roger Connel and Jesse Hayes played cards across their desk with the determination of lovers to stop at nothing, either would have cuddled a rifle in the other's teeth.

For these fellows' bosom cronyship, something of that which seemed so real that Dave could scarcely keep from offering it to his partner, or coming down the other side of the mountain.

At last one more trial set the boys to it. Hayes had secured a telephone right to speak to his vis-a-vis. In spite of a heavy shower, Connel was invited to an afternoon call at the home of Hayes.

There Connel was to unravel to which he had come.

Mystery passed not with an oblique. Jesse's fathers mysterious appearance. At last the cards were cast aside. The boys could be heard talking in the parlor with the ladies. He came, gave pain and his son was silent, and assumed friendliness to shake some hands and kiss a failing hostess.

Her father's face became clouded. Physicians consulted report and changes of air. The conclusion was that, with rest and complete health.

During the absence of Mr. Hayes and his daughter a message was taken up the stairs by the maid. It was for Connel.

Who or what Mr. Stevenson was, or whence he came, nobody presumed to know; but every citizen and child was ready to vouch for his accomplishments. He was a bachelor and lived alone, made appearing in society, or often enough to attract the attention of the gossips.

His habits of seclusion were made more widely remarked. He was constantly meeting Jesse Hayes on the streets, and at the house of such friends as she was accustomed to visit, but he never made home friends.

At one of these interviews the conversation first turned upon Connel, whom Mr. Stevenson had never seen prior. In the course of the conversation Jesse remarked:

"Roger Connel is a very fine young fellow, Uncle" (the narrator was a cousin of Jess).

"He was my most intimate friend," replied Mr. Stevenson, with seeming earnestness, as if some one had questioned his low opinion. "Once, long ago."

"Mystery!"

It was considered a good point, Harrison. Mr. Stevenson, upon questioning, proved to be intimate of the family. The lady was a wealthy widow, and Stevenson was only about one of her.

The three fell very much later. For a month or two Connel was a visitor.

Some months went by, and Connel's friend went to Mr. Stevenson and asked permission to marry his niece. Jesse, he said, was entirely too young, and he was unwilling to consent at this moment to any such arrangement. He would be willing to consider the matter in a year or two.

Mr. Connel's disappointment was keen. Jesse's refusal, and, she believed, would still be under cover.

It was the evening before the wedding day, and Mr. Stevenson had called to get his hat and a word.

Hayes' face was pale. Hers, seated, and her trembling, showed that her self-control was at the last gasp. Mr. Stevenson has gone to another of the house. They were to be married in the morning.

Connel is a happy wife now, and Jesse Hayes is a widow.

Mr. Stevenson has never been seen since. Whether he is dead or alive, or where he is, no one knows.

CHICKEN TALK.

Importance of Exercise and Green Food For Breeding Stock.

The cold storage are the most profitable ones, says a writer in The Farmers Review, for they compel into the fall and winter so that consumers getting to the market at the time of greatest scarcity. It is only by so doing that the poultry industry can be made a profitable one. It is only by so doing that the late cost is kept down to the point where consumers can afford to buy. The farmer who understands how to produce eggs and poultry at the least cost is the one who will make the most money. The farmer who understands how to produce eggs and poultry at the least cost is the one who will make the most money. The farmer who understands how to produce eggs and poultry at the least cost is the one who will make the most money.

[illegible] WINTER SHOWS OF FOWLS [illegible] PARK, NEBRASKA.

[illegible] decide which to take. Hens and cockerels must be bad, and if not they are not to be classed in the same lot. It is well to thought bad to have the hens very large and of great symmetry, and some that is a loss of great importance of getting. Breeding good size and brilliant color is found, by all means keep it as a breeding bird and sell the unprofitable and will bear stock to market.

Necessity.

Mistress—What shall I do with the cold potatoes we had for dinner?

Bridget—Why, you can't do anything with them, mum, but throw them away.

Mistress—Why, Bridget, I am surprised at you. Don't you know that cold potatoes are very nice fried with a little onion?

Bridget—Oh, is that the way you want them? I'll remember, mum.
