Social instincts of Animals.

Some recent contributions to animal psychology, which are both new and interesting, have been made by Mr. Francis Galton, on the half-wild cattle of western South Africa, which he thus describes: "The oxen of which I speak had belonged to the Damaras, and none of the ancestry of these cattle had ever been broken to the harness. They were watched from a distance during the day, as they roamed about over the country, and at night they were driven with cries to inclosures, into which they rushed much like a body of terrified wild-animals driven by hunters into a trap. Their scared temper was such as to make it impossible to lay hold on them by other means than by driving the whole herd into a clump and lassoing the leg of the animal it was desired to seize."

Yet these wild creatures are available for service, and Mr. Galton had nearly a hundred of them broken for the wagon, for packs, and for the saddle. He had an extensive experience with the beasts, and beguiled the monotony of days by observing their mental habits, especially the working of the gregarious and self-reliant instincts. He represents the animals as being stolid and socially unamiable, even spiteful toward each other. "Yet, although the ox has so little affection for or individual interest in his fellows, he cannot endure even a moment's severance from his herd. If he be separated by strategem or force, he exhibits every sign of mental agony. He strives with all his might to get back again, and when he succeeds he plunges into its middle, as if to bathe his whole body with the comfort of the closest companionship." This terror at being separated, evincing a total want of self-reliance, had its practical inconvenience, as "the traveler finds great difficulty in procuring oxen for his team, ordinary cattle being totally unfitted by nature to move in so prominent and isolated a position. A good fore-ox is an animal of exceptional disposition; he is in reality a born leader of oxen. Men who break in wild cattle for harness watch assiduously for those who show a self-reliant nature by grazing apart or ahead of the rest."

Good Advice.

An article in the May number of Home and Health, on "the health of women," by Julia Colman, has the following good advice:

"Be sure to retire early. Dio Lewis says that he has found this rule absolutely indispensable in his school for young ladies. Many a maid and matron has robbed herself of early bloom, and grown thin and worn for lack of an hour or two more of sleep before midnight. Some take this time to read after the children and husband have retired, saying it is "all the time they can get. Others think it necessary to devote these hours to their sewing. I know one dear, good woman who always will insist on sitting up to finish any garment nearly done, and dearly enough has she paid for this "sin of finishing off," as her family facetiously call it. But if time must be taken from sleep for such purposes, it is better to take it in the morning. Such a change of hours should be made gradually, but when made it pays well.

Nine o'clock is a good hour for all hard working women to go to bed, but if we grow sleepy go earlier. Above all things we should not allow ourselves to nod or doze before retiring. Of all forlorn moments in one's life, I know of none so utterly desolate as that which comes to the person who must "wake up and go to bed." Besides, an imperfect night's rest often follows such indulgence, and the subject rises already weary before commencing the work of the day. A nap in the middle of the day, if it be not too long, will be of decided benefit to the tired woman. The great difficulty is that it should not be taken soon after dinner, and before dinner we are apt to be busy.

But whatever we do, we must be reasonable, use common sense, and understand ourselves.

"THE SEASONS."—This is the title of a New York weekly paper, an "independent critical journal," devoted wholly to music and the drama. It is beautifully printed and illustrated. Its articles are written with rare brilliancy and talent, and in its pages the lovers of the drama and dramatic writings will find many a refreshing morsel. Each number is adorned with the portrait of some star in the dramatic or musical firmament, the number received to-day containing that of Mrs. C. A. Barry, beautifully executed. It is published at 83 Nassau St., at $2.50 per year, single numbers seven cents; its editor's name is Paul F. Nicholson.
