STRANGE REVERGE. THE MAN WHO NEVER LAUGHED AND WHY HE NEVER LAUGHED.

[CONTINUED.] There was a heavy storm in Mayence on the 21st of November, 1822, raining from 6 o'clock on the morning till midnight. Toward 8 o'clock on the evening of that day, Maj. Hasner, of the Prussian army, was dancing his little girl on his knee as usual, giving her his mustache to pull, and listening to the recital of her prayers. After receiving several of those big, childlike kisses that resound so charmingly, he laid her down in her little cradie. As soon as Mile. Charlotte had closed her eyes, her mother rocking her and sing-eyes, her mother rocking her and sing-ing softly one of those little lullabys that can be traced even to the savages, that can be traced even to the savages, the officer went into the parlor where his mother sat waiting for him. He kissed her forehead in sincere filial affection, then walked up and down the long room several times, halting finally before a window to look out upon the gleam of light that stretched from the parlor candles upon the wet sidewalk.

A graceful young woman, one finger on her lips and stepping lightly out of the room where her little girl had just fallen asleep, approached the dreamer, who, though he had just been promoted to a majority, still wore his captain's uniform.

"What are you dreaming of, Fred-eric?" she saked, as she leaned her head against her husband's shoulder. "Of you, Marths," he answered, as he reached out his arm to draw him toward

"No, but the prospect of passing my evening at the inn, when it would be so much pleasanter for me to stay at home with you."

"Then why do you go?"

"You forget, my dear, that my old friends, Welsch and Buggler, have offered me a punch for to-night, which we are to drink in honor of my promotion."

"Then they don't allow women in your miserable old tavern?"

"It is they who refuse to come. At least, that was the way of it when I was a lieutenant. Since then, Martha, I have been with you so much that I don't know whether there has been any hange or not."

"Then go quick, so that you can come back all the sconer," said the young wife as she disengaged herself from her husband's arms.

husband's arms.

Major Hasner, who had now reached his thirty-fourth year, was one of the most promising officers of the Prussian army. His character was mild, and his regular features carried an expression regular features carried an expression of the Prussian army. Town SEND He threw his great army coat him, buttoned it up, looked out of about him, buttoned it up, looked out of the window, and then came back and sat down opposite to his mother, and beside his wife. Martha had in her hand one of Mile. Charlotte's little rib-bons, which that young lady was prob-ably dreaming of at that very moment. "Come, go on now, and let her have this seen all alone," said his wife, who saw his hesitation, and wished to help him out of it.

saw his hesitation, and wished to help him out of it.

She received another kiss, and the major, after having traversed the room three or four times with measured step, bade his mother "good night," with a sigh, stopped a moment before the door of the bed-chamber to hear the regular breathing of his child, and then went

There was stiff a fine and drisnling ain eutside. It was quite a distance between the major's house and the cafe lux Armes de Brandenburg, which was ituated near the cathedral.

not have made much difference to him; and then he would have been equally indifferent hew late he remained at the tavern. But that was when he was a lieutenant, when he was in France, when his mother was far away, and before he knew Martha.

The major was late in arriving, and is appearance was received with the lost respectful salutation from his bordinates and a hearty shake of the md from his friends.

The veteran Buggler, who had been the first to arrive, had taken the largest table in the room. He broke out in hurrahs when he saw his companion enter the room. Hasner had served under his command, and he was delighted at his promotion. As to Weisch, he arose, spread out his mouth, and his great porcelain pipe vibrated in the air as it hung for a moment between his teeth, a post it neverleft except to be filled again.

"Gentlemen," said the latter, as he turned to the officers who were watching the progress of the punch, "which one of you speaks French?"

"I know something of the language," answered Maj. Hasner, as he areas, "in what way can I be of service to you?"

The young man looked into the calm face before him for a moment, then shut his eyes and pressed one of his hands to his breast, as if he were in pain.

"I beg your pardon," he added, in trembling voice, a moment after, "but are not these!—and he pointed to the epaulettes on the major's shoulder, "are not these the innignia of a captai in the Prussian army?"
