Z. C. M. I. CLOTHING DEP'T. NEWS FROM GREENLAND! YOU TO BUY! "No," said Kate; "what about?"

"Why, there's to be a grand ball on Thursday next at the Town Hall. Everybody will be there, so I dame to ask what you intend to wear."

"Oh, I suppose plain white; that becomes me best."

"Well; now mind, look your best. But, pshaw! what is there worth dressing for in this place?"

The evening came, and Mary Gardiner, who was acknowledged to be the belle, endeavored by every art to engage the attention of Harry Cullen, who on his part felt flattered by her preference, little dreaming of the jealous eyes that were watching his every action. He danced with her, and talked, until suddenly he remembered with a start, as if waking from a dream, that the magnetic spells of this girl's voice and manner had so engrossed his time as to me he him entirely negligent of Kate. He hastened to her side, and, in the most winning manner, apologized for his long absence; but Kate was hurt, deeply hurt, at this sudden, strange desertion.

Perhaps pride and jealousy had something to do with it, for she told him DEPARTMENT. FURS is now Open TEASDEL & CO Our Stock of Up Stairs, Emporum Buldings. THE BEST IN THE WORLD AND FOR SALE LOW. Perhaps pride and jealousy had something to do with it, for she told him she was sorry to be the means of depriving him of such pleasant company, and insisted on his leaving her. He implored her; but she, seeing the fair hold she had on his affections, was determined to punish him, for this and evening at least, by refusing to dance with him, and also by showing him that if he could firs she had a perfect right to do the same.

Twice during the evening she had found Charles Brandon's eyes fixed on her with a singularly pleased expression on his face, as if he had divined her secret cause of trouble. In a short time he came round to where she was, and asked the pleasure of a dance.

At another time she would have refused, but now—now was her opportunity for revenge. What better chance could happen to prove her spirit than by dancing with his rival? She knew these two men lailed each other on her account, and to graffly her anger she danced with Brandon, which act estranged her from Henry the remainder of the evening.

The next morning Harry Cullen, being sad at heart, and yearning to make his peace with Kate, determined to call on her; but, en consideration, thinking it would be advisable to give her time to recover from her bad humor, cent her a note instead, asking her forgiveness, and intimating that he would see her that evening.

Having despatched the note, he went out to the woods for a stroll, with his dog and gun.

Kate had spent an unhappy night; bad dreams had disturbed her rest; the face of Brandon, as she had seen it when she refused to become his wife, malignant and vindictive, had haunted her, and even the remembrance of his face when dancing had caused unpleasant recollections. Then her quarrel with Harry. Would he even speak to her again, after the outrageous manner in which she had treated him? Could she accept it? Or could she justify her conduct?

And, oh, how she loved him! It made her aimost heart-sick to remember how, in her vindictive anger, she had scornfully turned away from him, while he gazed at her so representilly. Thus she racked and tormented herself about him, wondsting what would become of her if he descried her.

She felt unable longer to endure the misery, and at last found relief in a flood of tears. Presently a knock came to the door. She listened intently and with a fluttering heart, hoping against hope that it might be her darling Harry.

Calmly and quietly she spent the day—almost happy—reading his note over and over again, and longing intently for the evening, which, with its darkness, would usher in his beloved presence.

She goes to the window and asks the informs her that it is the dead body of a man found in the woods, killed by the accidental discharge of a gun.

She shudders at the tale, and wonders how his serrowing friends will bear the loss. Perhaps he has a will to mourn for him: perhaps some fond girl who will be heartbroken at the news!

Having left the window, she suddenly returns, thinking herself stupid at not having inquired the name. Perhaps it might be some one known to her—when she was horrorestricken at easing her Harry, pale and hiseding, carried by!

She shrinks "I killed him!" falls back in a desthilke swoon:

When Kate returned to consciousness all the ghoon and misery of a firsting seemed concentrated in that one moment. Poor Kate Miller! The shock was dreadful. She thought also never asked herself that question when she took Charles Brandon for better, for worse. In less than one year after the hour of that bendle auffaing a freshe amount of sorrow than joy to Kate Brandon. A good devoted mother, an excellent housewife, but a companion, adviser, guide to this evil natured, heartless, pittless man—never.

But the time had come for her, and the great mystery of death was closing around her. Charles Brandon had gone out in the morning, carelessly inquiring "how ahe foil."

The answer received was:

"No better; send the doctor as you pass."
