ORGANIC CHRISTIAN UNITY.

For fifteen years an organization has existed in England having for its object the unification of the various "Christian" sects. It has not made much pracatical progress. But recently its spirit has laid held of some prominent Churchmen, and lectures and sermons ordained, administering the one baphave been delivered by eloquent "divines" in discussion of the best means to attain this important end.

But if the theory that obtains in disaster rather than a benefit. It is claimed that of the diverse organizations cash has its own peculiar sphere, and that each accomplishes things that could not be reached by the others, and therefore the result of division is good instead of evil. This is a remarkable conceit in view of the exhortations to unity given by the Divine Author of the Faith and of the streauous efforts of His Apostles to preserve and perpetuate that unity.

Bishop Coxe of the Episcopal Church is an active worker in the cause of organic union. He has written, or rather edited, a book which claims to show what was the creed of the church before the Council of Nice. It is supposed to be an elucidation, by authority, of the Apostles' and Nicene creeds. It has been thought that if these could be established, they would form a basis of Christian doctrine on which all sects could stand together. But, though the purpose in view may be excellent, it is not likely that the scheme will succeed to any marked extent.

And the doctrine of apostolic succession will in itself form a never ending source of controversy as to where that succession has led and wherein is held the true and virtual authority.

While it is perhaps true that people holding different views in many important particulars may agree to regard all people as brethren, or as Christians, who confess that Jesus was the Christ and that faith Him is essential to salvation,
