ELIZABETH MAGIE.

"WHITE SLAVE" WHO WISHES TO SELL HERSELF.

Miss Elizabeth Magie, the young Chicago woman who offered herself for sale to the highest bidder, is repentant and says she has been misunderstood. Relatives and friends have overwhelmed her with burning criticisms.

"What I really meant," said she a few days ago, "was that I would sell the labor of my hands and brain to secure for myself opportunity to develop the best that is in me."

"The ambiguity of my expressions has led to grief on the part of my friends and myself. Of course, I am a white slave, but I am not on the block physically."

Since her declaration that she was a typewriter slave at $10 a week who would sell herself to escape her present condition Miss Magie has been the recipient of hundreds of letters and personal calls from the persons who have become interested in her.

EVENING GOWN OF TULLINE.

Frilly, fluffy frocks of chiffon tulle, or net, can find no better mode to display their charms than the decollete gown illustrated. White tulle is the material employed with insertions of spangled lace occupying an important part in the trimming scheme. Around the bottom of the skirt are rows of narrow flounces of the tulle, each one edged with narrow white satin ribbon. White satin is used for the girdle, and also forms a handsome trimming for the decollete. The skirted silk lining is reinforced at the bottom by a narrow tape of feather ribbon set in the hem at the top of the flounce, this holding the billowy ruffle of net well spread.
