CHINESE CLOISONNE WARE.

Probably the finest quality of cloisonne now manufactured is that which comes from Peking. The Industrial Mission depot, a branch of the Peking industrial institute, has recently been opened at Shanghal, where a large sup-ply of cloisonne is always on hand, and where vases, bowls, jars, plates, boxes, incense burners, water pipes, umbrel-la handles, elgar boxes mapkin rings, etc., can be purchased at any time. Goods are packed by this depot and shipped to all parts of the world. The cloissone exhibit of the Peking indus-trial institute was awarded a gold medal at the St. Louis exhibition of 1904. The following quotation regard-ing the manufacture of this ware will be of interest: sonne now manufactured is that which be of interest:

The design is then etched on the cop-per base, and delicate copper ribbons are shaped by means of pincers to fol-low the lines of the design. These are cemented into position by means of a special vegetable glue, fortified by a metallic composition, which main-tains the shape of the wire tracexy while it is being annealed in a primi-tive oven surrounded by a wire cage containing charcoal, which is kept at a red heat with fans. An artist, supplied with a number of saucers containing all the colors he requires, takes the vase, and, from memory, and without reference to any illustration, fills in the inter-stices between the wires (the clois-sons) with the proper pigments. These consist of crystals with a base of salt-peter and a kind of calcareous sand-stone found in the neighboring hills. The different colors are obtained by stone found in the neighboring fulls. The different colors are obtained by composition with fron pyrites, oxides of iron, or salts of lead. The colored crystals, ground to a powder, are mixed with the water, and the semilting crystals, ground to a powder, are mixed with rice water, and the resulting paste forms the base of the enamel. The colors are applied by means of a small trowel, and the operation calls for great skill and dexterity. "When all the spaces are filled the vase is again baked in the oven for a certain number of minutes, as de-cided by the expert in charge of this operation. When cool the vase is smoothed off with a file and returned to the coloring room, where all defects smoothed on with a hie and returned to the coloring room, where all defects are made good. In some cases sev-eral of the spaces must be done over again; the solid vitreous color is chipped out and the cloison refilled with paste.
