

[From Life Illustrated.]

THE MODERN YOUNG LADY.

The complexion of the modern young lady is a dull dead white—like tallow, or discolored wax—her eyes look as though they had been boiled, and are about as devoid of expression as the optics of any wax doll in a shop window. Her hair, which she generally wears in a profusion of bushy ringlets, is screwed up in bits of old newspaper all night and half the next day. Her lips are pale, and her teeth black and decaying—the result of eating too much candy, cloves, and cardamom seeds, of which the modern young lady carries a goodly supply in her pockets. Her shape is "exquisite"—so all her female friends say—by which we are to understand that she is tall and slim, like an overgrown celery stalk, and about as large around the execrably little waist as the diameter of a moderately sized bean pole.

She is "extravagantly fond of reading," knows all Byron and Tom Moore by heart, and peruses all the yellow-covered literature as fast as it issues from the press. Indeed, she sometimes writes poetry herself, of which we can devise no better comparison than a quantity of thrice diluted milk. She considers Shakespeare "a bore," and rational reading "makes her head ache!"

Her health is extremely delicate; strange to say, she is almost martyred with those horrid headaches in the morning whenever she has danced and sipped water ices until midnight the evening before. She is afflicted with "strange feelings" and unaccountable flutterings of the heart, and any little excitement throws her into strong hysterics. Of course the modern young lady don't believe in daily exercise—it would kill her to walk half a block, unless there is a prospect of meeting Theodore Exquisite on Broadway, and then she'll go half way down to the Battery without a murmur!

She thinks it vulgar to know anything about household duties; never was in the kitchen but once, and then saw a spider and nearly fainted away! She don't know whether soup is made in a frying pan or a tea-kettle; can't make bread; don't know the use of a dish-pan, and couldn't roast a turkey if her life depended on it. It is so refined to be ignorant on these subjects!

She never sews—this part of the household economy, together with the kitchen responsibilities, rests upon the much enduring shoulders of her tired looking mother, who never complains, however, for "Arabella is so genteel!" If a button comes off the paternal garments, Papa never thinks of asking Arabella to sew it on. If Peter's toes make a breach in the stocking department, he never dreams of requiring his sister's aid; and if you ask where the mother is, your are told she is repairing Arabella's clothes!

She dotes on music—spends three or four hours every day in strumming on the piano, and warbling sentimental ballads; she draws divinely, and there are several monstrosities in crayon and water colors, hanging up framed and glazed on the parlor walls in everlasting evidence of her genius.

She makes wax-flowers and does crochet work. She was "finished" at Madame's fashionable seminary, where she learned to speak ungrammatical French and to dance "sweetly." There's no denying that she has received "every advantage."

She can't bear the country—it is so dull and stupid—she abominates a quiet domestic evening at home, because it is so prosy! When her weary old father asks her to play a tune for him, she disposes of the subject summarily and sharply, "he's too tired!" but when Mr. Beverley Brainless comes in a few minutes afterwards, redolent of Frangipanni and rose oil, and repeats the request, she complies with smiling alacrity, and sings and strums until you would think the piano was coming literally to pieces.

She goes to church regularly every Sunday, bearing a prayer book bound in finest gold and velvet, and while the minister is preaching she takes an inventory of every bonnet, dress, and collar in the sacred edifice; she should think Mrs. Jenkins would be ashamed to come week after week in that old Leghorn bonnet; is sure that if her father dear was as rich as the Misses Atkins' papa, she wouldn't wear those horrid old dyed-over silks to church—wonders why Tom Seward don't look this way; and is forced to have recourse to her smelling-bottle when the two poor Miss Brownes go by her pew in neat gingham dresses. How vulgar!

She never thanks any gentleman who gives up his seat to her in a railroad car—is very angry because the infirm old gentleman who sits next don't squeeze himself up into a fraction of no room at all to give her crinoline a fairer field, and puts her perfumed handkerchief to her aristocratic nose if simple calico approaches her rustling silks and gossamer lace! Adores children whenever she can get up a picturesque effect by so doing, but is very cross to her little brothers and sisters at home!

The modern young lady always grows delicate by degrees, as the Saratoga season approaches, and talks about melancholy dooms and early deaths. Whereupon papa looks incredulous—he's been caught more than once in that trap! But he is at length subdued by a skillfully got-up series of hysterics, vapors, sobs, and entreaties, and Miss Arabella goes off to Saratoga, while the rest of the family economize pitifully at home, and an extra wrinkle grows by degrees on papa's forehead, down in his dusty little counting room on Fulton Street.

Here she meets a young gentleman equally well stocked with sentimentality and stillness.

She falls in love with his distingue graces and hyacinthine curls; with his quotations of Alexander Smith, and his agreeable conversations about moonlight, music, and so forth; and he with her aptitude at the redowa and the simpering smiles with which she listens to his whispered nothings. After a series of preliminary softness, he falls on one knee in a romantic manner and declares his everlasting passion.

Then follows an episode of white ribbon, shopping, snow colored kid gloves, and orange-blossoms, and the young couple, both of whom put together know about as much as an intelligent calf, start hand in hand on the journey of life. How they'll get along together as traveling companions, we leave the public to imagine.

Reader, this is an accurate delineation, sketched from life—don't you admire the exquisite character of our Modern Young Lady?

THE FAIR! THE FAIR!!

The Board of Directors of the D. A. & M. Society are happy in being able to announce and would most respectfully and particularly invite the attention of the citizens of this Territory to the fact that the THIRD ANNUAL STATE FAIR will be held at the Social Hall in Great Salt Lake City on Monday and Tuesday, 4th and 5th of October next.

The clerk of the fair, John M. Brown, Esq., will be in attendance for the purpose of receiving goods and articles intended for the exhibition on Thursday, 30th inst., and Friday, 1st of October, upon which days all articles must be brought in, with the exception of stock, which will be received on Monday, the 4th, and exhibited on Tuesday, the 5th.

The Awarding Committees, whose names are here added, will meet on Saturday, the 2d, at 9 o'clock, a.m., for the purpose of awarding prizes.

The Board will spare no pains to make the occasion one of interest and profit to the inhabitants of this Territory, and it is sincerely hoped that the people will most heartily respond to the repeated calls of the Board and assist them in making the Fair worthy of an industrious and skillful people.

The attention of the public is called to the fact that none but members are eligible to draw prizes. Any person can become a member by paying $2.00 into the treasury for the first year and $1.00 annually thereafter. It is hoped that those members who have not renewed their membership will promptly do so, that the society may not be restricted in usefulness.

Cash, grain and all kinds of available pay taken from members. Do not forget to bring in your produce and articles of home manufacture at the time and place appointed.

C. H. OLIPHANT,
By order of the Board.

The degenerate habits of the men—the aversion to marriage—the celibacy of the middle classes—the avoidance of procreation amongst the lower orders—all these causes combined are beginning to tell with fearful effect upon the rising members of the French race. The reports of the examination of conscripts in the rural districts of the country, will give you ample reasons for this alarming decay, which a few years hence will drive the country by physical reasons alone to a second rate position among the powers of Europe.
