While this result was the desire and expectation of a large and important portion of the President's supporters at the polls, Curtis could not believe it was desired or anticipated by the intelli gent citizens of the country. If the persistent pressure for spoils had been resisted firmly and no change tolerated beyoud an equitable division bet ween the parties, that might have been accepted as a permissible compromise. Under the difficult circumstances Dr. Curtis believed the reform system would have been so strongly entrenched in public approval that at the end of the second term of the administration which was established, no succeeding party or president would venture to If President Cleveland interfere should declare that the general politi cal reconstruction that had taken place was due to a change of conviction on his part in favor of the
