Draughts from Salt Lake.

My observation that the trials of a life of polygamy appear to fall in undue proportion on the wives, is not a new discovery. The contrary is told by the wives themselves, that any one knowing the other side, and considering what labor and judgment and self-sacrifice are necessary to the proper ordering of these extensive households, might wonder the balance of sympathy to the husbands. An idea I find very consoling. If there is a glimpse of heaven, I have seen it in these higher-toned Mormon women, who by principle amid tempests of trial and horror pierce a woman's heart to know a second hand.

The idea that consolation is the bond on the part of the men, is utterly refuted by Mormonism of both sexes, and no less by your own common sense, when you consider that the women have become a little familiar with their domestic life, such as it is. No husband, who carries in his face a stamp of character, as obvious to a woman "arrived at the years of understanding," as an action that over the way of creating himself a kingdom.

Well may the Mormons be proud of their beautiful city. It is doubtless the best initiation of Creation ever achieved. To the very troops by the United States Government during the Mexican War, they responded loyally; and their reward was some very valuable knowledge concerning irrigation, upon which the welfare of the great West entirely depends.

Salt Lake, however, is but the nucleus of existing Mormonism. Throughout Utah, as I have learned elsewhere, the ample land is mostly occupied as sites for Mormon towns, which through emigration and the predictions of the dying out of the system. The great Salt Lake also, in whose verdant bosom lies the overgrowth of Mormonism, in this season subsiding. (A shrewd, intelligent mountaineer recently gave me his views of a city of the future, though such a one as the worst enemy of Mormonism, had he ever lived in the shadow of the Ten Commandments, could not regard as a consummation devoutly or otherwise to be wished.)

"I put in," I am very much interested, "that what is to break up Mormonism is the population from the mining districts, that's now mining in the west, and they're coming down on a colony of miners. They're quick to see any sort of principles that was ever invented."

We went through the empty Tabernacle, inspecting at leisure everything, including the interior of the organ and the President's sofa. We walked upon the length and breadth of the foundation of the Temple located beside it, now raised to a height of some twenty feet above the surface of the ground, and deeply sunk beneath. The walls are exceedingly massive, the area they enclose immense. The material is a beautiful light-colored granite, quarried from the neighboring mountains. When completed according to the design, the new Temple will be used as a place of beauty by any structure in the world.

We called on notable women not a few. Some were occupied with household duties, and all without exception bore marks of labor as to their countenance, a draft-horse after long service. Yet the old-eyed Mormon women, described by imaginative writers, I did not see; neither the degenerated offspring of polygamy; and I feel bound to say that both classes are a myth. These ladies whom I saw in every-day state were mostly and lastingly dressed, while in looks and manner and conversation they prove their position to my mind at all events less unfavorable than that of thousands of my countrywomen of aimless and indolent life, who never know the best meaning of the word development.
