SAM ASKED HER.

All the orchards flushed with ripe pink harvests of bloom, and the meadows were purpled with violets, and yet the soul of Mrs. Levibelt, in the great cream colored farmhouse on the top of the hill, was sore disquieted within her.

"I always happen on at spring cleaning," said she complainingly. "Usher a lot of company comes just when you've got the carpets up and the bedsteads down, or else your help runs off and leaves you."

"Don't fret, mother," said Sam. "I'll help you. I'm a master hand at whitewashing, and I guess I could unroll it you would give me a brush."

Mrs. Levibelt laughed in spite of her vexation at the idea of Sam, the fine gentleman of the family, who was sculpting for the summer, cavilling flies, in fine fit to last perfectly entire.

"Why can't I as well as you, mother? I'm strong."

"Yes, but— Right! Who is that coming?"

A blue wood girl was advancing on the garden path with the strange, elastic tread, all familiar to those who have been accustomed to plenty of outdoor exercise, and smiled frankly on her the suspicious face of the farmer's wife.

"Might I have a drink of water, please?" she said.

"Certainly," said Sam at once. "I'll draw some fresh for you out of the well."

"Who are you?" questioned his mother when none could.

"My name is Annie Maclare," she answered simply, "and I am a stranger in this country. I come from Aberdeenshire, in Scotland."

"What are you going to do?"

"To look for work," she said Jessie simply. "I was brought up on a farm, and I'm handy and willing. Do you know of any place they're wanting a lass?"

And the upshot of the interview was that Mrs. Levibelt took the sweet lassie—and, as it were.

Jessie proved to be the best and quietest and most orderly of serving damsels and full of bright, good humor.

The fine sewer stood, and save over the spring renewed, and Mrs. Levibelt, true to the calendar, saw up her carpets and delighted every soul in cleaning nails and house. And Jessie Maclare was with her still.

The housecleaning was in wild career. The carpets were on the line, and Sam was on a ladder deep a little masonry paper-hanging, while Mrs. Levibelt polished the knobs of the keeping room window, when the carriage from the depot rolled up to the door.

"Company!" gasped Mrs. Levibelt. "Railways happens." Quick as thought, Jessie descended from her mental elevation and scudded to the bedroom for Mrs. Levibelt's cap and a ruffled apron.

"It's a young lady with a young gentleman," she announced, whispered Jessie, Mrs. Levibelt groaned. "It's my cousin, Miss Henshaw's daughter, Sybilla, come to make a visit," she sighed. Miss Sybilla Henshaw was from the city, market quite an young one as young as she was had being but amazingly well preserved. She had come out into the country ostensibly to visit her cousin, Jessie, but in reality to marry Sam.

Jessie's heart sank within her at the sight of Miss Henshaw's silks and laces and chains and bracelets.

But Sybilla's eyes were keen enough to discern a possible rival in the blooming lithe bonnie girl, and she resolved to get her out of the way. When Sam Levibelt came in to supper the third day after Miss Henshaw's arrival, he found Jessie crying, his mother stormy and mortified and Sybilla—alone.

"Oh! now she has taken it!" said Sybilla. "Who else would touch my portemonnaie? And it was on my dressing table this morning when she went into make the beds, and now it is gone."

"Nay, Sybilla," said Sam reproachfully, but very firmly. "No one calls Jessie a thief in my hearing. Mother, you should know better than that."

"But," stammered Mrs. Levibelt, "if Sybilla's pocketbook is really gone——"

Sybilla drew out her pocket handkerchief to wipe away an imaginary tear of injured innocence, and with it doubtless was something on the floor. Sam stooped and picked it up, handing it with a bow to his cousin.

"Your pocketbook, Sybilla."

Miss Henshaw turned scarlet and Mother Up.

"How very careless of me!" she said in a choked voice. "I must have put it there myself and forgotten all about it."

That evening in the purple dusk, after Miss Henshaw had gone up stairs to pack her trunk—for the visiting campaign had evidently proved a failure—Sam found his courage equal to where Mrs. Levibelt was sitting, pleasing whether she did or might the guess best day or the last parlor.

"Mrs. Levibelt," said the girl simply, "I have come to tell you that——"

"Not that you are going, and in the very midst of housecleaning!" shrieked Mrs. Levibelt.

"No," said Jessie, coloring like a rose, "if you like, I will stay at the farm at wages, for Sam has asked me to marry him."

And Jessie Maclare cried and laughed in the same breath.—Dorcas Glenn.

In Their Own Language.

A personage who is widely known in the ecclesiastical world as his usual wont and manner was the late archbishop of Canterbury's coachman. He served Dr. Tait also before his elevation to the archiepiscopate, while as for he occupied the see of London. Stories of coachmen have been told of the pacification of this traditional, and the following seems worthy to take its place. One day, when, as living in London, he hastily was returning from some meeting in the city, the carriage became blocked with omnibuses and the coachman, very unlike to go on until he could do so, was heard by the worthy prelate. The irritated bishop, from the front seat of the window and angrily remonstrated.

"Pray your pardon, my lord," was the smart reply of the coachman John, "but I heard you tell them 'we gents as was on silence' last Sunday that if you don't speak to people in their own natural tongue you will never get 'em to understand you."—Pittsburg Dispatch.

Carpet bedding is undoubtedly less fashionable than in former years.

Tender varieties of vegetables should now be planted out in this or inches, if not already done.

Her Majesty is claimed to be the most beautiful rose grower. In England it is a perfect success, whereas in the United States it is not. In foliage is apt to mildew.

The formula is universally adopted in partial death. For pot plants to which plumes in summer or for planting along walls or fences with a north aspect in city yards there is nothing more valuable. They bloom the whole summer long.

The nasturtium is one of the best annuals that can be grown in poor soil. It is the connecting link between the vegetable and the flower garden, being useful and ornamental in both instances. In good, rich soil it laid out on open borders, but when they are grown on hard ground at will, cottages long up a comfortable run of bloom from midsummer till frost.

To whom it may concern:

I have been effected with kidney trouble for years, and have tried many remedies and different doctors, but I can truthfully say that Professor Hier, and other remedies, is wonderful for one that I have ever taken, and can unreservedly recommend him to the afflicted. I was troubled with a severe pain in my back, and was unable to bend without great pain. And I was troubled with blood in my urine, but am now entirely free from all symptoms of kidney trouble. I cheerfully recommend Professor Hier to the afflicted.

STATE OF TEXAS, COUNTY OF MILLSPAUGH.

Before me the undersigned authority, a notary for aforesaid, personally appeared George Thompson, who being duly sworn, says that he is the owner of 3 Bank Notes indorsed with the name of Thomas Bates, and the amount of each note is $1,000, and that said notes were stolen from me. I was robbed by a man who said his name was Bates, but as all Texans have two names and one will not do, I have been unable to find out his other name. I am satisfied that I can identify said Bates when I see him again. I was robbed on the 3rd day of October, 1894, in the county of Millspaugh, State of Texas, and I have been unable to find said Bates since the robbery. I am satisfied that said Bates is now in the county of Salt Lake, Utah, in the vicinity of Salt Lake City, and I have reason to believe that said Bates is now under the name of Thomas Bates, and that said Bates has failed and refused to pay the amount of said notes, and the interest thereon, and the interest thereon amounts to $180, and I have been compelled to employ counsel and prosecute said Bates in the courts of Millspaugh county, Texas, and have been put to great expense and trouble in the premises, and I am willing to pay a reward of $100 for the arrest and conviction of said Bates, and the recovery of the said notes and interest thereon, and I am willing to pay all reasonable expenses of the officer who may arrest said Bates, and bring him to Millspaugh county, Texas, for trial.
