

REDEMPTION : FOR THE HEATHEN.

THE Methodist, in an article on the salvation of the beathen, makes the following remarks:

his own hands, his acts are intrin-sically wrong; but if done in obedisically wrong; but if done in obedi-ence to his conscience they are right actions to him and evince, a purpose of righteourness which would gladly respond to the claims of the gospel when presented to him. The fact that he does anything to be saved is a bester ground of hope for him than multitudes in Christendom, can have, for they are doing nothing. And the fact that he does, these have for they are doing nothing. And the fact that he does, these things conscientiously is as good a ground to hope that he will be saved through the mercy of God in Jesus Christian can have that he will be saved for anything the doom of the dammed when he be conscientioned to the dammed when he that he will be saved for anything the doom of the dammed when he that he will be saved for anything the doom of the dammed when he that he will be saved for anything the doom of the dammed when he that he will be saved for anything the doom of the dammed when he that he will be saved for anything the doom of the dammed when he that he will be saved for anything the saved for anything he can do."
