In Women's World.

An article in the Month's Companion, on occupations for women has following suggestions which may be of special interest locally, where women are considered of the first importance:

The steady growth of membership in patriotic societies has broadened a field in which a few women have been doing successful work for many years. Only those who can prove their descent from ancestors who have rendered certain services, civil or military, to the country, or who came to the country at some definite time or in some particular company, are eligible for membership in these societies; and as most persons have never the time nor the skill to secure the necessary information, the assistance of a professional genealogist is required.

There is also a steady demand for such work by those who are interested to know about their ancestors, and who are simply able to have a record prepared in manuscript or for private publication. These two would-be members of patriotic societies and interested individuals are the usual sources of orders for this work.

The genealogical societies do not employ professionals; nor, as a rule, do family associations. Family histories and genealogies generally are a labor of love, or of very small pay, and are prepared by some amateur genealogist. Such books seldom or never repay the cost of publication.

The qualifications for a genealogist are accuracy, patience, perseverance, and love of the work. One's penmanship must be perfectly legible, one's English unimpeachable, and one's method of work systematic. A good education is essential, although, as a matter of fact, few of the best genealogists now in the field are women who have had the benefit of college training.

The woman who takes up such work must have, or acquire, an intimate knowledge of the history and geography of the section of the country which her research is to explore, and of England during the period of colonization. She must be able to copy with absolute accuracy, to make trustworthy abstracts of printed matter or manuscripts; to write true and interesting biographical and historical sketches and descriptions of persons, places and events; to use books of reference or manuscript records to secure information in regard to any subject required; and to classify and arrange her information in accordance with established models so that her work may easily be understood by others.

A typewriter, and the ability to use it, is almost a necessity; shorthand is not a requisite, as it is not sufficiently accurate for genealogical work. Familiarity with legal papers, such as are found in the records of the land and probate offices, and with civil and military records, such as are kept by the several states, must be acquired.

The ability to see the significance of minor details, to follow out even trifling clues that may lead to important information, and to preserve only that which is significant and valuable, must come through experience, and can come in no other way.

For the genealogist, perhaps more than any other professional woman of today, experience is almost the only teacher. The field is as yet untouched by the colleges except indirectly through the study of history and English, and it is altogether too advanced a subject to be handled in the secondary schools. It might be possible to secure a student from some one already in the field, but those all seem to have worked their way independently into such standing as they have won.

A student cannot, in any considerable extent, practice law or medicine upon herself or her family, but one can practice genealogical research for any one except a recent immigrant—who will furnish what he knows about his immediate ancestors as a beginning.

Any good public library contains certain standard genealogical books of reference, which, with local histories and records, will furnish material for the record. Clues there obtained must be followed to the county seat, or to large libraries or to other towns, as may be necessary. A careful study of the systems of record is necessary, and charts or blanks for recording information will be found indispensable.

In the beginning, the worker will be obliged to give a great deal of time for which she will obtain no profit but experience. As she becomes familiar with the work and competent in it, she will be able to secure orders from those who wish to know about their ancestors or to join some society, particularly if she is a member of some such society or of a woman's club in her own town.

She will regulate her charges according to her skill and the time spent in the search, until she receives 75 cents or $1 an hour for her time, besides necessary traveling expenses for work away from her own home town or city. If she has the necessary qualifications, and puts as much time into the work as she would take to prepare herself for any other equally technical calling, the woman genealogist will find herself in command of a profession that is not only profitable, but remarkable, because of its many peculiar advantages.

It takes one among the pleasant and honorable class of people; the record office and libraries are comfortable and sometimes delightful; the hours are short, and one may work whenever it is most convenient or agreeable to do. There is a great variety to the work and plenty of opportunity for the development of any professional talent one may possess. It presents fields for study right in the line of one's work. Its results, although unpublished, are likely to be handed down for several generations, and if printed, are a permanent addition to genealogical knowledge. Its ranks are not, and from the peculiar qualifications and long experience necessary, are not likely to be overcrowded; and it requires little outfit for training and for outfit.

WOMAN DEPUTY SHERIFF AND MODEL HUMANE OFFICER.

Mrs. Jennie E. Powers of Keene, N. H., is a deputy sheriff, who, in the exercise of her duties is sometimes called upon to shoot and either maim or kill, as the case demands.

This petticoated deputy makes arrests like any other of the thousands of deputies. She has all the skill of the city store detective, all the cunning of the woman plain clothes inspector and is absolutely fearless. She has also a home and a husband and some of the prettiest little children in all the Granite state. She draws $2,500 a year and fees, likes her job, and says that she "loves to make arrests."

In the last two years alone she has personally investigated nearly 1,500 reported cases of inhuman treatment of children and animals; has made over half a hundred arrests, securing conviction each time; has killed on the first shot 157 horses that she found suffering or unfit for work, and has rescued 68 children from cruelty and neglect.

Mrs. Powers was born and reared in Brattleborough, Vt.
