CAUGHT IN A PRAIRIE STORM.

Prairies! The very name can make me shiver. When covered with snow they are as trackless as is the ocean to an unskilled navigator. I would about as soon cross the Sahara without a guide as to try to get over the snowy plains of the west and northwest. The real fright I once had in one of these tracks, sir, was bad enough to serve me for a life-time.

Tell us about it, Captain.

Well, I don't mind. My uncle Dan and his family were staying at D. settlement; for he had taken the western fever, and they went out there. Uncle Dan was always a speculator—though he did manage to line his pockets well. He purchased a vast tract of land at D. with an eye, it must have been, to some such promises as were held out to Abraham of old; for acres and acres of his land he could never personally utilize, though later he might sell it again to advantage. I was out helping him. The family consisted of his wife, two grown-up daughters, and two young sons; and there was a niece, Cordelia. From the first moment I saw Cordelia Barwell I thought a great deal of her. Perhaps that's why I stayed in the uncivilized place.

"Rolfe," said uncle Dan one morning in the latter part of the Winter, "it looks like a fine day, does it not?"

"Clear and bright, sir," I replied.

"Ay, likely to last. What say you, then, to taking Brown Bess and going to Bingley's Mills for me?"

"I will go with pleasure, Uncle Dan."

"The weather may break up any week, now, Rolfe, and I must have the lumber ready to come down the river as far as the Forks with the freshets. There's a master lot to be got down next season, and we shall have a vast deal of teaming to bring it over from the Forks. But Rolfe, I know it will be a good speculation. By erecting a number of cheap substantial buildings on sections of my land, I can advertise and sell first rate."

"Well, sir, I am ready to go over to Bingley's Mills for you, and make what arrangements you please about the timber."

"So. Hector, boy, go out and get the mare harnessed.',

"Uncle Dan, may I go to Bingley's Mills too?" cried a pleading, pretty voice, as Hector leaped off on his errand.

"I could hardly believe my ears. The voice was Cordelia's.

"The child must be crazy!" called out aunt. "Do you know the length of the journey, Delia?"

"It's a lovely day, aunt. It won't hurt me."

"Yes, it is a lovely day, mother; so clear and calm", cried one of the other girls—Myra, I think—with quite an eager tone. "And poor Delia never goes anywhere."

That was true; but still I felt astonished. Later, I knew that it was a kind of conspiracy. The girls all wanted to get some trustworthy person to go to the postoffice at Bingley's Mills, to post letters and get some that were lying there, not intended for papa and mamma to read.

"I really don't see why Delia should not go," said the unsuspicious, good-natured uncle. "You will be sure to take care of her, Rolfe."

"I will try to, sir."

So in less than half an hour from the time it was first mentioned, I was gathering up the reins, and Brown Bess was tossing her head until the bells jingled merrily.

"It's royal traveling," called out Uncle Dan, as we started. "Don't be out late, Rolfe, for it has been a severe snap of weather lately, and——"

The rest was lost in the crunching of the crusty snow, and the ping, ping, ring of the cup-shaped bells.

"This is an unexpected honor, Miss Cordelia," I began, as the sleigh went smoothly along.

"Susan and Almira voted me their minister plenipotentiary," she responded coldly.

I and Cordelia — who was no blood relation of mine—had had a falling out of recent date, which made it all the more surprising she should have cared to go with me that day. She was one of those high-spirited girls who never strike their colors.

It had happened one evening about a week before. My aunt had had a gathering—for there were settlers enough in the vicinity to give us social evenings—and about a dozen people were present. You may fancy, perhaps, that we have no intelligent spirits in the prairies, but this is a mistake.

Cordelia and I had disputed about the relative characteristics of men and women. She claimed the sweet attributes of patience, purity, and constancy, claimed them entirely for her sex. I gave genius, persistency, and strength of character to mine. To vex her still further, I averred my opinion that women were a mass of sentimentality, impromptu shrieks and vaccillations.
