incredible Spiffles, and just as she had brought him, by dint of herculean exertions, to the point of confessing his sins, that the penitent should have suddenly assumed the comely form of the youthful pastor; and fervently poured forth a confession of a wholly different and much more tender character; whereupon she awoke just soon enough to prevent her from falling into his arms in a delicious swoon? The slumbers of Diana too, were enlivened by a similar and not less wonderful metamorphosis; the difference being that it was a delinquent urchin, who, by some "devilish contrivance," was instantaneously converted into a miniature copy of Mr. Wakefield, barely in time to seize and rapturously kiss the hand just raised to box his ears. As for the gentleman himself, if he dreamt at all, it was of undergoing his final examination afresh, in which he was horribly badgered by two old Doctors of Divinity in female attire, under whose ruthless catechisings, Jonathan Edwards himself could not have escaped a miserable failure.

Had Mr. Wakefield been a much duller man than he really was, he could scarcely have reached the end of the first month of his ministry, without perceiving the interest he had awakened in at least two of the members of his flock.

When Miss Deadset applied, which was almost daily, for the explanation of some difficult passage of Scripture, or sought advice as to the best method of dealing with some obstinate convalescent, who with the prospect of returning health, seemed perversely disposed to emerge from the state of wholesome gloom to which her visitations had happily reduced him, there was a tenderness in her tone and an earnestness in her manner, indicative of that zeal which proceedeth from the heart.
