City Ordinances Concerning Name Held by Supreme Court to be Valid—Continution of Precedents.

The Supreme Court handed down an important opinion today in the case of O'Brien, 413 U.S. 572, involving the rights of a citizen to burn the American flag as a form of expression. The Court, in a 5-4 decision, held that the government cannot prohibit the burning of the flag as a form of expression. The majority opinion, written by Justice Brandenburg, held that the government cannot prohibit the burning of the flag as a form of expression. The majority opinion, written by Justice Brandenburg, held that the government cannot prohibit the burning of the flag as a form of expression.

Defendants also denied that the amount of the blood in arteries and veins was sufficient to cause a fatal poisoning; that it is absorbed in various organs only, and not with the exception of blood poison; that it has no such its constitution of the blood.

On the first contention the Supreme Court finds that the ordinance was not

As to the second contention, the court holds that the ordinance in question was passed by virtue of the power

The defendant was charged with the murder of a man of 31 years. The case was complicated and tried before Justice Macpherson, who found the defendant guilty on the ground that the defendant had not made any attempt to constructively defend himself, and that the defendant was a man of bad character and of low intelligence. The defendant was sentenced to death.

On this point the court holds that when it appears the constitutionality of a statute is raised and upheld by the dissenters, then the Supreme Court does not initiate an independent determination whether the judgment is determinative of the validity of the statute. The court said:

Concluding the court said that Judge Ichniowski acted in furthering the public interest in punishing the defendant guilty and in removing the defendant from the community already placed "in harm's way as the defendant have been found and requiring more charges," says the court. The case is commensured with instructions in the trial court to not apply the order and take heed but to discharge the defendant.

The opinion is written by Justice Miller, Chief Justice Waite and Justice Harlan concurring.
