A RIBBON TRIMMED TURBAN.

The perennial blossoming sailor shape is hinted at in this hat, though the style is really more mushroom than sailor, the very large crown coming out almost to the edge of the brim. Around this big crown is folded a wide strip of simple satin ribbon, a huge flat bow being arranged directly across the back of the hat. The little cluster of cherries and leaves at the right of the front adds just the sufficient touch of extra trimming to make the turban attractive and individual.

In Woman's World

Roses in a factory! Real roses, wild you, pink and soft and delicate petals, roses, sending out their exquisite garden fragrance among the odors of oil and leather and acid; roses with drops of dew jeweling their half-closed leaves, kidneys and American Beauties and Marabel Nibs standing in jars among belts and tool benches and electro-chemical baths, real roses for the basic material which the curious factory converts into metal rose-bud hatpins for Missy to pin her floppy tulle hat securely on her pretty head. Perhaps you've seen them in the city—metal rosebud hatpins in the big jewelry stores, wonderfully accurate and true to nature—and have wondered how the artist secured such faithful reproductions? But they are the work of no silversmith. There is just one place in the world that turns out these metallized rosebuds, and that is a little

A SMART HAT FOR A SIX-YEAR-OLD.

Very heavy Cluny lace edging wired along the edge forms the brim of this pretty hat, and the high crown is trimmed with falls and loops of white museline ribbon. The top of the crown is covered with faded pink roses in their natural foliage, and the flowers and leaves droop over the ribbon trimming at sides and front. Just in front a cluster of vivid blue forget-me-nots adds a very French touch. Much of the charm of this child's hat is due to the big hair bows of pink and blue pompadour ribbon, which repeat the color tints in the flowers.

the factory in North Chicago. Here the germinal roses come fresh every morning from the greenhouses, hundreds of them at a time, some barely opened, some with two or three leaves curled back, some closed, some with their long green calyxes. Here the roses go through a new and interesting process that turns them into metal, hardening them beyond possibility of destruction and making them as strong as steel and as tough as iron, and calyx beyond chance of change.

"One blue blossom led at his work bench sweeps the roses from their stems—dip!—and another leads him, who's own step has led into a notched frame. Don't they wilt? The work is done too quickly, and then the buds are instantly dipped into a solution that preserves their freshness and shape, and hardening the petals without altering their contour. What is the solution?"

"Well, we aren't telling that—not yet," says the inventor, with a smile. "I expect it's a good deal of time and patience and money to discover that. But here are the roses drying. You might see if you could tell what we dip them in."

There were racks and racks of them, brownish from their dip, as if they had been varnished, nearly twenty-four hours out of water, but from and crisp and curly-pated as when they were brought from their stems. This batch is just ready for the electro-chemical bath.

In the electro-chemical bath they remain for an hour, taking up a copper deposit on the outer petals that hardens them to metal. Glycerine I lifted one of the blossoms by its wire, and examined it. It was grayish in color, and had the sticky gloss of metal on its leaves.

"See, the rose is inside still," said my guide, picking up a discarded bud from a tray, and tearing it apart. "None enough, there were the rose leaves within, brown and dry at first, but after being heated off, growing fresher and fresher, until at the center by the red heart of the rose just as in an actual flower."

"It is heavy now," explained the inventor, "but the metallized flower is finished. It is lighter than the orig-
