Open your purse. With generous feeling Do your buying. The task is not trying Down at the store where red bells are pealing.

What to give her? That particular thing The heart desires is there to tempt buyers To pause, admire, then of its beauty sing.

What to give him? Some women ask our aid. It saves worry in the rush and hurry. For him we have the choicest gifts that's made.

Now join the throng and elbow down the aisles; Jostle, mingle, every nerve a-tingle. Amid displays of qualities and styles.

Many Complimentary Words

Our customers and friends in all directions are complimenting us on the stand we took in not opening the store the first three evenings of this week. We did it in the interests of our employees, holding that it was too much to expect of the salesladies, the cash boys and the men to ask them to come back to the store every night, even if it did cost us the loss of a little business. The many favorable expressions convince us that our position was well taken, to say nothing of the words of appreciation on the part of our employees. There are no Christmas prices at this store. One reason of our tremendous trade is the fact that prices are lower than experienced shoppers really expect.
