THE ABUSES OF UNWRITTEN LAW

The vogue of appeal to the "unwritten law" is one of the abuses of modern times. In effect, Prof. Garofalo, a well-known Italian jurist and publicist, nowadays, suggests, any man, who can claim to be of a highly sensitive temperament can appeal to this legal phantom with many chances in favor of his issuing successfully from crime he may have committed. If he is an artist, he has special chances of escaping conviction, since he can plead, as most artists do, that he comes within the category of supermen, and that ordinary laws are not applicable to him. Give the reason claiming to be an artist being, or the possession of the "artistic temperament," but a medium through which to bare his soul and expose his emotions to mankind and the odds are in favor of his winning the sympathies of the unthinking multitude, who are disposed to accept him as an artistically irresponsible being and solely the victim of his emotions or emotionalism.

The old method of trying certain men and women for murders has partially departed. The actual circumstances of a given murder are not inquired into half so deeply as the "state of soul" of the murderer, says Prof. Garofalo, and however "inartistic" they be as regards temperament, few are so stupid as not to fall back on excuses which have saved many from well-deserved retribution. Explanation of the psychic temperament which characterizes any particular delinquent amounts to justification of the deed committed, provided only your criminal be interesting enough—in the possession of great wealth or unusual intellect, for example. Should his personality be dull or his social standing be poor, interest in him fails altogether to come into play, and then only does the rigor of the law assert itself mercilessly.

All this, Prof. Garofalo means to be taken to heart by his countrymen in Italy, although his animadversions upon the unwritten law would seem nowadays to apply to the rest of the world.
