THE PROVO CANYON SNOWSLIDE.

annound annound annound and a second

D trating the principles discussed, the professor dictated the following ac. count of the snowslide in Provo canyon. Incidentally it was made a test also in spelling and punctuation, as the students were required to put it into shape for the press. Needless to say, the characters in part 1 are introduced merely to illustrate the effect of the human element in descriptive portray-

"Oh, John, what is that?" asked Mrs. Barton, in a voice full of terror, Ŧ.

A low rumbling sound came pouring down the canyon. Both husband and wife started up from the rude couch and stumbled in haste toward the door of the descried house, where darkness had overtaken them.

By this time they perceived that the ominious sounds came from the direction of the Bridal Veil falls, just routh and across the river. It seened as if there was a continuous cannonading of distant thunder, with now and then a sharp report, as of the crash of heavy timbers

"It's a snowslide coming!" said John Barton, catching his wife about the waist and helping her up the steep hill. Scarcely a minute had elapsed since they first felt the shock of the imp nd. ing avalanche. The horses and buggy were in the canyon near the bridge-too late now to think of rescuing them.

A drizzling rain fell upon their bara heads, but Barton dare not go back into the fated house to secure the wraps Indeed, such was the increasing roar of the snow torrent that they gave little thought to these things, but pushed breathlessly forward up the northern defile of the gorge.

"Oh, John, what is that? We shall be buried alive!" and the woman's form became limp and lifeless in her husband's arms. Small need to ask the meaning of the terrible explosion. The first 10,000 tons of the moving snow had fallen into the bed of the river, and at every instant thousands upon thousands more followed with awful thuds.

Looking furtively over his shoulder as he continued to carry his wife out of danger, the terrified man beheld what would have been a magnificent opectacle had there been light enough to see it. Through the chasm out of which pours, during long summer months, the gentle stream of the Bridal cataract of snow, which must already have dammed off the swollen flood 500 feet beneath.

From the first deafening crash in the riverbed, until the echoes of the avalanche began to reverberate, there elapsed perhaps less than half a minute; yet to John Barton it seemed an age, "Thank God! we have escaped." said he, as his wife regained consciousness and began elinging to him.

For four hours they waited in the dismal canyon for the light of dawn. A number of times John had started down the dark gorge to see if his team was alive; but as rumblings could be heard intermittently above the fal's, ROF. NELSON'S classes in Eng-lish are just now sutdying the art of description. By way of illus-scarcely 300 yards above, was a quartercircle of snow hurtling through the air! Now it has reached the river. The high keyed deapason of the avalanche sud-denly descends to a deep bass of con-tinuous dull thuds, as the snow and rock and uprooted trees pile up in the gorge below.

Ah, what is this! The white mass begins to move down stream. Is it because of the accumulated momentum of the river, or is this lateral movement produced by the tilanic blows of the downpouring avalanche? On it comes --slowly, but with terrible majesty! It has reached the bridge and passes un-der. Will it overtake the fugitives?

Suddenly the deafening roar ceases, and the echoes begin. The gorge has vomited forth its undigested burden-the avalanche is still! Quickly the awe-stricken wayfarers hitch the team to the buggy; and none to soon, for the river is beginning to crawl over the flattened embankment. Already a stream is pouring down the road. Grateful in their sense of relief they hasten to leave behind them a scene which ere long shall attract hundreds of curious sightseers.

IL

As snow-slides are rather frequent in Provo canyon at this time of the year, little attention was paid at first the news of this one, which reached the city Monday morning. But when it was announced that the Rio Grande had employed three hundred men to clear the track, people began to believe it an unusual occurrence. lieve it an unusual occurrence. Such, in fact, was the interest awakened, that the railroad authorities began at length to see the financial possibilities of the situation, and accordingly announced an excursion to the scene on Th . day afternoon.

The agent, however, had far underrated the desire to see the avalanche he had provided only three coaches and two freight cars. The coaches had been filled and packed at the lower sidings; so that when the train reached the Smoot station, the two hundred students and teachers awaiting it had to tackle the box cars, where they clambered and hung in groups as thick an ants sunning themselves in spring time

The afternoon was beautiful, the sunshine being all the more glorious by contrast with the mists and clouds that had overshadowed the city for two months past. The heavy snows had disappeared, leaving a striking contrast between the rich black soil of the plowed fields and the whitened stubble of the unplowed patches here and there In the cottonwood graves along the river; the leaves had been packed into mats, and the leafless trees presented an unbroken aspect of gray, save in places where the timber-willow and kinni-kinic bushes glistened in browns and dark reds. The ricks of cordwood, neatly piled up among the trees, showed that the farmers had not been idle during the recent months of snow.

It was a transition scene-neither winter nor spring-that the excursion-ists looked out upon in the valley below. Before them loomed Mount Tim-panegas, always majestic but how covered from crest to foothills in a mantle of white. The Wasatch range con-tinued this aspect of loftiness and purity in a semi-circle on the northern, his wife had prevailed upon him to stay with her. The river, however, had plowed its way through, leaving a steep embankment 70 feet high above the track on the south side; and along this strip 300 workmen were busy shoveling snow, making a picture that reminded one of Gulliver and the Lilliputians,

In a direct line just north of the falls was an arch of snow which spanned the river; and from this a shower of drops, glistening in the sun like-well, like themselves, for they were brighter than pearls-streamed into the turbid river below. On the upper side of this arch were great rifts, showing where the flood had first burst its way through. With a shout and a rush the sightseers clambered over this natural bridge. In vain did the workmen warn them that the hanging mass of snow might drop into the river at any mo-meni. They crossed and recrossed, reckless of the terrible danger. Tunnels had been dug into this impacted mass of ice and debris and pres. ently the foreman of the wrecking gang warned the people back; two mines, which had been planted underneath, were about to be exploded. "How unfortunate," said one young odd things.

that the snow had barely reached the halfway house, and that fortunately both team and buggy were safe a few rods nearer the bridge. In view of the probability that another slide might come at any moment, it was dangerous to attempt rescuing their wraps; but John did so, and hastened to get his horses out of danger. The Bartins had left Provo the afternoon previous for their home in Provo valley, but had been warned by a soc-tion hand near the falls of a snowslide farther up the canyon, which would prevent their getting home that night. Darkness was setting in-should they return to the city? They concluded to pass the night in the Bridal Veil cottage, a large rock house, the home of tourists in the summer, but deserted during the winter because of dangers just like this which had happened.

Its windows had been broken in by vandals, and it presented all the dreariness of a haunted house. Yet it was a shelter from the threatening clouds un til morning, when Mr. Barton doubted not he would find a way past the snowslide. Provided with neither light nor fire, they tried to protect themselves from the cold by improvising a bed on the floor out of quilts and laprobes: and thus were they waiting for morning rather than sleeping, when the first rumblings of the avalanche aroused them.

To go on now was clearly impossible: a wall of snow 50 feet deep blocked the dugway. Another danger beside the still threatening avalanche also mepaced them; the river, which had been completely dammed off for hours, might force down its flimsy barrier at any moment and overwhelm them.

With nervous hands John Barton hastened to lay the watersoaked harness his shivering team. But scarcely had he untied them from the tree, when that marrow-searching rumble beyond cliffs of Bridal Veil was heard again. Louder and more terrifying it grew at every second. The loosened horses, sensing by instinct the danger, plunged down the canyon. The man and woman, unnerved by fright, clung to the ropes, and so were half dragged to the bridge, when the cataract broke the second time only irregular patches of lake, still frozen over, looked in the sunshine like a fragment of the plains of Paradise.

The first signs of human, activity met their view at Telluride: a neat collecmodern cottages clustering tion of around the new power plant in a cove at the mouth of Provo canyon. The 50,000 horse power dynamos were not yet in operation; but work was in progress at various points, both on the grounds and on the buildings.

As the laboring locomotive pushed the loaded cars into the narrow defiles of the canyon, all eyes were turned toward the smoke-stack belching forth its dark-hued clouds, which presently changed into curling wreaths, then changed into curing wreaths, then hung in the air like a long ribbon of blue, which, as it lay along the snow-banks on the northern slopes, suggested the university colors. Nunns, the present location of the Tel-luride powerplant, the excitement of anticipation became evident among the excursionists.

"Look! there is the snowslide," said a gushing young thing, pointing to a long streak of white on the north side of the canyon.

"Pardon me, but you are mistaken," replied a member of the university ge-ology class; "that is only a snowslide. not the snowslide. Every large hol-low on the north side of the canyon has such a baby avalanche at this time of the year, but none of these reaches the Wait a minute and you'll see the real thing.'

The town of Viadivostok, against which the Japanese appear to be getting ready to make a combined attack by land and by water, is the eastern terminus of Russia's Transsiberian railway. It is admirably located for defensive purposes, and with the same amount of money expended upon it might be made as nearly impregnable as Port Arthur, although it, of course, lacks the strategic advantage given to Port Arthur by the Liautong peninsula.

By, this time the people had been forced back to the bridge, where they waited expectantly for what seemed half an hour, but what was really only about two minutes. The first mine seemed not to be very effective. I popped loudly, threw fragments a hun It dred yards in every direction, and filled the canyon with blue smoke. After a few seconds more of breathless attention the second explosion oc. curred. Following a deep soncrous sound, a mountain of snow seemed to expand upwards, then break into seams and rifts which were lit up with flame, and in an tinstant the gorge was filled with a white vapor that floated over the heads of the spectators.

The climax had come: the workman moved swiftly toward their shovels: the engine whistled the signal: and with a swift backward glance the ex-cursionists left behind them one of those scenes which at once depict the infinite forces of nature and emphasize the ant-like insignificance of man.

A NIGHT AMONG ELEPHANTS.

In the night I was startled from sleep by a crashing in the nearby jungle, which sounded as if all the frees in Sumatra were being torn up and sim-ultaneously smashed to earth. In the oundless midnight jungle the noise seemed tremendous, as indeed it was, and right at our very ears. It was my first experience with elephants, and I must confess it was herve trying to lie quiet with that crashing all around and no surety that the elephants might not take a fancy to stalk in upon us, or what minute the fancy might possess them. Nor did it lend peace to the anxiety of the moment to realize that one elephant, much less a herd, is only now and again, providentially stopped in his tracks by powder and ball; for at the base of the trunk and and the giant slide was two or three hundred yards above that. No sconer had the excursionists scrambled to this point, however, than the tremendous mass of snow burst upon the view, lit up in all the splendor of a full after-neon sun. From the base of the Bridal Vell falls it had completely spanned and filled the gorge of the river. It
