

HETTY GREEN IN OLD AGE.

More Human Side of the Woman Financier Comes to Surface at Her Old Homestead.

"The lesson of my whole life can be read in a few words. I inherited a certain trust. A heavy responsibility was placed upon me. I did my best to improve and develop my interests. I have proven that a woman may take care of a large business just the same as a man can. Yes, I am proud of that."—Mrs. Hetty Green.

BELLOWS FALLS, Vt.—Along the crooked streets of this town there walks every morning, at exactly 9 o'clock, a venerable woman, of sturdy figure who is dressed in black and moves with a firm step that would do credit to a woman of half her years.

The townspeople gaze at her with curiosity as she passes along to the postoffice, from which she merges with armful of mail. They recognize in her the famous Hetty Green, the embodiment of the highest development of financial genius ever known in her sex, the mistress of $40,000,000, nine-tenths of which is the reward of her years of endeavor and economy.

Few of the millions who know her by fame would dream it was she if they were to see her. Quiet and motherly, stopping here to kiss a child, there to advise a mother of a sick baby, again to pass the time of day with a tradesman, Mrs. Green is not the woman of the Chemical National bank, the cold money machine that harkens in seven numerals with the kings of finance in New York.

A representative of this newspaper found her in the middle of the street, surrounded by a group of children.

"It does not matter much to me how the world judges me," said Mrs. Green, speaking reluctantly of herself. "It does not matter if they think me old, a woman of finance and figures, a human cash register, without heart or soul. I am and have been misunderstood throughout my life. It is the way of the world."

"It ought to be realized that I have followed my own way pretty consistently, making my own business, not judging my neighbors and looking for rules in life to the ten commandments. I can go to my grave with the record of never having willingly done harm to another, that I have tried in my own way to do some good for others."

"You ask if a man has ever worsted me in a business deal. I can say that no man has," and here the old woman laughed. "Some know how I have been sued, but I always win, for I have right on my side. I am sure to have that."

"Now, remember this. Right will always win, if not today then tomorrow. To win, you must have right on your side. You must follow the ten commandments. They are the eternal law. "There are in this country thousands of clever young women who, if placed in my position, could have done better. I have always known how to buy cheaply and sell high, and that is the secret of successful business."

"There is one time in the year when I am very happy. It is when I come to Belows Falls for a rest in the old homestead. I drop all thought of business. I enjoy my friends and think of my children—Sylvia, my companion, and my boy Edward, whom the people of Texas want to become governor."

"I do not like to have my boy in politics. I let him once before to Mark Hanna when Texas wanted Tom Reed for president of the country. Perhaps you don't know it, but Mr. Hanna wanted Reed for president, and Texas favored him."

"I am an old woman, a little tired of work, and my son is my right hand. It is very well to talk of his duty to his state! He is a very good man, but I cannot help feeling that his first duty is to his mother."

"I've seen the world change," said Mrs. Green after a lapse. "I've seen people change, and I do not know that either is much better in spite of all our wealth and grandeur today. There is one thing I want to tell you, though. It tries my patience to hear all sorts of self-appointed judges crying that we are getting worse and that the country is going to the dogs. Really men and women are at heart about like their fathers and mothers were."

"You remind me that Russell Sage often took a pessimistic view of the conditions of humanity. Well, his life was, in many ways, an example to young men, not, perhaps, in every way. Still, on the whole, he set a good example and did much good. His wife wanted me to subscribe $100,000 to a lying-in hospital. I would not. I have no faith in big advertising charities with big expenses and big salaries to a lot of officers. I believe in giving quietly, in such a way that no one, not even the people who are helped, shall be aware of the identity of the giver."

"Do I admit that Wall street sets the example of immorality and extravagance? Well, I do not admit anything of the kind. I know next to nothing of Wall street, although people insist upon connecting me with it. I have nothing to say about Mr. Harriman's deal in the Union Pacific matter. I don't even know him. But if people go down into Wall street and gamble they take their chances, as they do in everything else. I sometimes buy in the market and sell when I get my price."—Atlanta Journal.

It is estimated that there are 200,000,000 Mohammedans in the world, 124,000,000 of whom are under Christian rule or protection. In nearly every important city in the Moslem world where the population is more than 100,000 there is a center of Christian work in the form of printing press, hospital, school or college.

Judge Lindsey, the originator of the Juvenile court of Denver, was not a professing Christian when he began this philanthropic practice, six years ago. According to his own statement, it was the sense of the tremendous responsibilities connected with this work which led him to ally himself with the Methodist church.

A novel institution has been organized by the chaplain of the Indiana state prison at Jeffersonville, and is known as the Federated church. To be eligible for membership in this church a prisoner must have an unblemished record for good behavior for at least six months previous, and upon joining he must sign a creed especially prepared for these men. Any member of the church who is found guilty of violating the rules of the prison will be suspended from membership, and will be reinstated only after six months more of a clean record. When discharged from prison each member will be required to designate a church with which he proposes to unite, and he will be dismissed on letter to that church.

A Talking Machine Museum.

Taking the initiative in this matter the French government has followed the best traditions of its predecessors, who have always guarded so jealously all works of art—a policy which has made the French museums probably the richest in the world. Paintings and objects of art of all kinds have been preserved from time immemorial, but the conservation of things interesting to the music lover has been confined per force to instruments themselves, and souvenirs and manuscripts of composers. There exists in Paris a museum at the opera-house in which are kept the original manuscripts composed or produced in France, but these souvenirs have almost exclusively to do with the composer. The singer of the past has left no trace of his voice, and the museum at the opera house in Paris has had to content itself with such simple souvenirs of artists as autographs or parts of costumes worn at historical representations. It was therefore this museum at the opera house was decided upon by M. Dufrain-Bouquet, Secrétaire des Beaux-Arts, as the proper place in which to guard for the future the voices not only of the French singers familiar to the present generation, but of all foreign artists of note who have triumphed at the French opera. Tamagno's voice is the first to have been so recorded. The method employed is interesting. The records themselves which have been made on specially prepared plates, have been inclosed in hermetically sealed metal boxes, containing a chemical compound to protect them for future years. These boxes have been engraved with the date upon which they are to be opened—one in 50 years, another in 100 years, and so on, the dates having been chosen to conform with the musical festivities which will undoubtedly take place at that time. This means that future generations will be able to enjoy the voices of artists long since dead, and who, otherwise, would have been to them only a name, and they will be able to compare the singers of their own times with those of bygone generations. We know that Malibran was one of the greatest sopranos of her time, and yet we are unable to judge whether she is to be compared with the Adeline Patti of our own days. This uncertainty will not exist in the future, for the records will permit of absolute comparison—thanks to the perfection now attained in the recording of the voices which are being placed in the museum at the opera. These voices include such great artists as Adeline Patti, Melba, Caruso, etc., in addition to all of the present school of French singers—Alfred Clark, member of American chamber of commerce, Paris, France.
