THE EVENING NEWS.

No Hope For the South from this Congress.

Speculation is rife about the probable action of the Republican caucus committee of the House. They are now considering what to do to re-establish the lost ascendency of their party at the South. It is said that a majority of the committee strongly favor the declaration of martial law in Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and Arkansas, and the free use of the army as a partisan instrument. This may be true, but we doubt very much whether the committee will (for prudential reasons) report that recommendation to their brethren of the House, and if they do, it is highly improbable that the Republican members as a body will approve it. What is the need of asking for martial law at the South when it already exists there in sufficient force for partisan uses? The violent removal of five members from the Louisiana Legislature, under an escort of federal bayonets, was an exercise of martial law as fully as if it had been proclaimed in advance from the housetops. Martial law never appeared more haughty and oppressive than when Major Head with a squad of regulars, entered the office of Sheriff Flanagan at Vicksburg and forcibly ejected him. This case, by the way, has peculiar elements of wantonness and audacity wanting in the Louisiana outrage. The President was an avowed supporter of Kellogg, and had told Congress and the nation that he should go on recognizing and sustaining that man until Congress settled the troubles of Louisiana by legislation. It was expected that if occasion arose, the President or his representative at New Orleans would assist Kellogg with the army. The brutal raid upon the legislature was only the execution of a pledge by which the President held himself bound—a part of his announced policy. But in the affair at Vicksburg the President had not previously committed himself against Flanagan, and therefore cannot plead any prior obligation as an excuse. In the Louisiana case the President justifies the action of the military on the ground that it saved an outbreak and bloodshed. But he cannot say that of his interference at Vicksburg. Sheriff Flanagan, having been chosen at a special election December 31, was in peaceful possession of his office, and awaiting any legal proceedings which his adversary chose to commence. No appeal had been made to the law against him, and the business of his office was progressing to the general satisfaction, when the government steps in without the least provocation and pulls him out. What could the full sweep of martial law do more than this? There was here no pretence that a republican form of government was being subverted. Republican institutions were not in danger because Flanagan held the small office of sheriff. Neither the Governor nor the Legislature of Mississippi had asked for this intervention. It was, in its origin and performance, purely a Federal act, and was probably ordered from Washington, for it is not likely that in the present state of public opinion any subordinate officer would take such a step without sanction at head quarters. We may therefore fairly assume that the President, by these twin acts of usurpation—the one at New Orleans and the other at Vicksburg—merely illustrates the policy which he intends to pursue towards the South. If this is so, it is a waste of trouble for the republicans in Congress to recommend any further military domination in the Southern States. President Grant shows himself willing and ready to interfere in the South in the interests of his party to any extent, without a word of advice from Congress. His friends and accomplices in that body, knowing this, will, if they are shrewd, avoid the mistake of attempting to give the color of law to such outrages. There are good republicans in Congress, we are satisfied, who will never consent to put the south under martial law, and who will make open rupture with their party if it is seriously proposed. There are other republicans who are willing that somebody else—the President—should maintain martial law at the South, but are not candid enough to vote for it themselves. Only the extremest radicals will stand up and boldly avow their determination to control Southern elections by the military arm, as the President has been doing of late. The great peril to the country will not come from the action of Congress in the adoption of new tyrannical measures toward the South, but from its inaction in permitting President Grant to go unchecked. The silence of this Congress, we fear, will give consent to the President's policy, and the South will remain under an undeclared martial law, and infamies like those of New Orleans and Vicksburg be frequently repeated, until a new Congress takes seat; and that Congress, we flatter ourselves, will have something to say about it.—New York Journal of Commerce, Jan. 21.
