INDUSTRIAL PROGRESS.—Now, let us face boldly the state in the plainest language what the industrial decadence of our country, whether it will come sooner or later, will mean when it begins. Statistics are unnecessary here; they tend to be precise and might give rise to a suspicion of being sensational. It will mean that we shall lose one foreign market after another; that we shall gradually cease to manufacture for other manufacturing countries; then that these countries, after supplying themselves, will meet us and beat us in neutral markets; finally, that we shall be reduced to the supply of our own demand—possibly to secure even that market by recourse to a protectionist policy. This will be a terrible reverse—a misfortune, and it may be a miserable change. It must involve a vast and grave misfortune; it may, but it need not, involve ruin. The extent and depth of suffering we shall have to undergo during the sad period and the weary struggle will depend upon how soon and how deeply we recognize the coming revolution, and how wisely and courageously we meet it. The great ultimate, and far, we have to look at is this.—The home demand for our iron, cotton, woolen goods, &c., may be about one-third of the whole; we manufacture mainly for foreign consumption. A great part of our productive industry is at present, and ultimately hope to keep going. Two-thirds of our artisan population, therefore, must cease to be—or to remain. That vast proportion of our industry which is now maintained by agriculture, commerce and manufactures, will have to be maintained by agriculture and commerce almost alone. We shall, therefore, only be able to support 20,000 people, instead of 30,000,000 as at present. England will become a second Holland, greater, richer, more powerful than the first. But she may be a more prosperous and happy Holland still, if she only sees her destiny in time, and carries up her hoist to meet it as a great nation should.—Contemporary Review.
