TOO LARGE FOR STREETS.

The lack of a parade is a feature with this circus. Instead of being a sign of weakness, which they would not show by allowing a public to gaze at would not permit of a parade in addi-tion to the other duties. The parade was the beginning of the circus. The mediaeval pageantry had the parade first and the show was tacked on afterwards. Now it seems that the evo-lution of the circus has carried it to a stage where it has forgotten its source, and after hundreds of years has become a show in tents only, and not to the merits of the change, the small boy vote being pretty solid against it. The first show began at 2 this af-ternoon, after side shows and freaks had gathered in the dimes of the copstantly increasing crowds from 10 'clock on.
