The World says McCormick, the United States Commissioner General to the Paris Exposition, is very busily engaged in making preliminary arrangements for the proper representation of American industries. He said, yesterday, that he is now occupied in selecting from a large number of applicants for permits to exhibit those whose applications may be rejected by reason of the very limited space allotted to the United States. McCormick says the bureau is overrun with agricultural machines, more than there will be space for, and more than there is any excuse for exhibiting. Experts are now busy selecting the machines most worthy of exhibition, and those only will be accepted. The list of exhibitors cannot be made up until all the applications for space have been passed upon and the privileges at the disposal of the bureau equally apportioned. The commissioner has appointed a committee to inquire into and report upon the feasibility of making an exhibit of American art.

The Merald's London special says: The funeral of the King will doubtless be an imposing affair. His remains will be placed in the family mausoleum of La Lohrie, which stands on the hillside, overlooking the city of Turin from the north. The hill is a spur of the Alps.

The Tribune's Washington special says: Careful inquiry leads to the conclusion that the present Congress is unfavorable to subsidies. A considerable number of democrats in the present House, who would otherwise vote for government aid to railroad and other schemes, believe it to be wiser to postpone action on the subjects until after the elections next fall. The Texas and Pacific bill may possibly be reported from the committee on Pacific Railroads in the House, but there is even some doubt about that.

The Times' Bucharest special says, in relation to the capture of the Schipka Pass, that a heavy Russian force, on January 3rd, marched along the Trjjan Pass, and crossed the mountains, after suffering incredibly from the severity of the cold. This force, on Tuesday struck the rear of the Turkish position at Schipka, while the attack was commenced by Radetsky four hours later on the same day. The fighting is reported as not severe considering the numbers engaged. The Turks, being surrounded, became demoralized, and surrendered after a short but bitter resistance. The losses of the Russians are reported at 800 killed and 2,000 wounded. The heaviest fighting was on Radetsky's right, in dislodging the Turks from the heights overlooking the Russian position. The rear of the Turks was attacked by Mirsky, and not being fortified, and in comparatively open ground, the Turks experienced the heaviest loss in killed and wounded. The capture of Schipka imperils Suleiman's position at the head waters of Isker, at Samova, and will at once force him back on Adrianople. The Russians are short of supplies and not able to advance. A force of Cossacks has been sent south to harass Suleiman's line of communication and secure supplies from the country.

The Times' Pera special says: The loss of Schipka is regarded in Constantinople as worse than the surrender of Osman Pasha. The Turkish force in the Pass consisted of 16,000, nearly all veterans, and the most valuable troops in the service. They fought desperately but were outnumbered five to one. There is great danger that the Turkish army will either be dispersed or have to surrender, as the Russians are near Adrianople and can cut off their retreat. The only hope of safety is in the Russian inability to push southward from the Balkans owing to the lack of supplies. An enormous number of fugitives are leaving the country about Patar Bajardjik, whose sufferings, owing to the severity of the weather, will be unparalleled. The loss of Schipka insures the dominance of the peace party and makes peace more certain from the Turkish side, unless the Russians, stimulated by their late successes, may demand impossible terms.
