

A little old-fashioned chamber, and a little old-fashioned occupant. A pretty tiny room full of quaint treasures...

She moved her dressing-table back to its place before the window, lighted her candle again, and, standing in its light at her high, narrow chest of drawers...

Each thing had to be taken out separately that it might be put in properly afterwards, "old maidishly," as Nettie used to say.

First the little squares embroidered case with "postage stamps" worked elaborately on one side, and containing the one stamp still, which had been put in to it at its manufacture...

Like Nettie drew out and slowly opened it. It was but one sheet of note paper and barely filled, yet it took her some time to read...

Almost unconsciously she turned back when she had finished, and read the last leaf. "Dear Nettie, I should have urged all this before, but I waited until you should be of age..."

"Nettie, love, do you think your mother would have commended the life you lead? I do not care to mince the matter...

"I am, dear child, your ever-loving aunt, ELEANOR LITTLETON."

There was a long silence in the room after Nettie had read these words aloud to herself, then the candle was snuffed with a quick, resolute little hand...

She signed her name with many words of love and gratitude, read the letter over twice, folded, sealed, and addressed it; put on the one stamp out of the perforated case...

"Have you not kept me waiting long enough yet?" she was sneeringly greeting she received, as she stepped to meet her, standing his steps with difficulty.

Such a sneering, pitiable figure, despite its height and good proportions. Such a mean, unmanly face, despite its regular features, hair, and eyes...

"You told me, you said you would do for me..."

"Did I?" she drawled, fumbling in one pocket. "Then why didn't you give it to me?"

"You took it with you," said Nettie, quietly, as she stooped to bolt the door again.

"Don't argue with me. Where's my supper?" "Just one o'clock," the girl said very low, without raising her head...

"That's no business of yours. Get me some hot water." "Not tonight, father," Nettie, coming nearer to him...
