

A SEVERE JOURNEY.

Klondike Experience of a Young San Franciscoan.

A TRIP OF TERRIBLE HARDSHIP.

Receipt of Forty Three and Ten in Great Abundance—Gold at the End of It.

The following from the San Francisco Chronicle is a letter written by a young San Franciscoan who found the trip to Klondike full of hardships:

E. W. Engelhardt of Seattle, a former student of the University of California, manager of the San Francisco Laundry Company, left for Klondike with the first expedition that departed from Seattle last February. The vessel as was on was wrecked, and though he was not hurt, nearly all the effects of the passengers were lost on the coast at Bella Bella, and what little was recovered was almost worthless. Engelhardt lost his outfit and found himself destitute and far from his destination, but help came at last, and the party reached Dyea.

In a letter written from Dawson to his parents here, Engelhardt describes graphically the week and the rescue and the trip overland from Dyea to the gold fields.

"Here (at Dyea)," he writes, "we found snow and a river covered with this, which rendered it impossible to make things worse, while it raised continually and we were at last able to cross it on our skidged sledges, we had to travel.

"The trip was full of the most terrible hardships, and a journey that many made in one day, took us ten days to make, and we were nearly starved on the way. There is no level ground here, nothing but a steep climb, while the trail is not and never wide enough for a sled.

"If I had any money I should have bought a pack animal, but I had none. I had to carry everything myself, and I was nearly killed by the weight of my outfit. I had to carry my rifle, my gun, my traps, my food, my clothing, and my bedding. I had to carry it all myself, and I was nearly killed by the weight of my outfit.

"I had to carry my rifle, my gun, my traps, my food, my clothing, and my bedding. I had to carry it all myself, and I was nearly killed by the weight of my outfit.
