MODEL MAY TESTIFY AGAINST THAW.

Rose Marston is one of the many young women identified with the gay studio and theater life of New York whose names have been coupled with those of the principals in the Thaw-White murder in that city.

Miss Marston, who is an artist's model much sought for by limners was formerly a close friend of Evelyn Nesbit-Thaw, the former chorus-girl whose husband, Harry K. Thaw, shot and killed Stanford White, the famous architect, several weeks ago. Despite her former friendly relations with Mrs. Thaw it is believed that Miss Marston's testimony will be unfavorable to Thaw.

BRIGHTON NOTES.

The Brighton season is now at its height, and the hotel under Mr. Nielsen is often crowded. While the thermometer has been bobbing around 90 to 96 in Brighton, there is hardly a night in Brighton when people do not have to build fires. The beautiful mountains, the pines, and the verdure of Brighton were never more charming than at present. There is more snow on the peaks and in the crevices than ever before at this time, and the mountain flowers are more profuse, facts which show what a heavy winter the high regions are emerging from. It is estimated that 500 people are now at the hotel and in the cottages surrounding, and on Sundays, especially, when the mail arrives from Park City, bringing the Saturday "News" and other papers, the rush is something that almost bewilders Postmaster Will Brighton and his wife.

The 24th of July passed without any general celebration, although a number of quiet bon-fires and evening musicales were given at various cottages, a baseball game being played in the afternoon on the limited flat in front of the Pyper and Whitney cottages. Mrs. Susa Y. Gates has arrived and taken up her abode with her daughter, Emma Lucy Gates, and her sons, whose tents are pitched in an ideal spot almost buried in the pines on the east side. Other cottages which are open, many of them being crowded with guests, are the Brightons, the Browns, Karrieks, Ferrys (the flag between the two being visible for miles down the canyon), the Whitneys, the Pypers, the Fisher Harries, the Caines, the Lewises, the Channings, the Spencers, the Baileys, the Rawlins, the Brooks, the Morris, the Godbes, the Short's, and many others, whom your correspondent has not yet encountered.

Mr. and Mrs. A. Gabbott and Mrs. E. D. Knappen are visiting Mr. and Mrs. Pyper.

REMINISCENCES.

Back o'er the path of the pioneer,
Back o'er the desert lone;
The endless span,
And caravan
Braving a sea unknown.

"I was lost once," said a young rider of the Teton basin, as he sat among some old pioneers on Pioneer day. Reminiscences were going the rounds of all assembled, dating back principally to that bygone pilgrimage in quest of a land by a crystal sea. Our younger pioneer, the true son of his fathers, had something to tell of his own experience and continued:

"I was on my way to the basin with a load of freight—supplies for winter—and running somewhat of a risk to be traveling over that great waste of country so late in the fall. I had as I thought, escaped all storms, and called myself lucky as I came into view of our beautiful valley and the Teton peaks. I crowded too soon, I guess. Just as dusk was coming on, and I seven miles from my claim, a slight snow-storm began whirling about. I paid little heed to it at first, so sure was I of reaching my shack in good season. It was not long, however, before the ground was white, the road obscured, and my guides and sentinels, the towering peaks, lost to view. I jogged along cheerfully enough—my horses knew every step of the road, so many times had they covered the distance. Put by and by they stood still, looking about through the whirling mist; they were puzzled, bewildered, and so was I. It was then I realized I was lost, and as near home, too. I did the best I could; we traveled for hours and miles without reaching anywhere. I finally gave up, cared for my faithful horses, and crawled beneath my tarpaulin, under the wagon. A bright morning light awakened me, and I started up to find I had camped within a few feet of my own fence. Strange, wasn't it? so near home, and yet as I traveled about in that whirling world of white, I never felt so completely cast adrift in an unknown sea; never so alone, and yet, never so near my Maker. This last assurance put me to sleep."

"Exactly," piped up the oldest pioneer. "Exactly. Alone and yet not alone. I crossed the plains to find that out. That great, silent, solitary desert where nothing but God remains."

Back o'er the path of the pioneer,
Back o'er the shifting sand;
Back to the heat
Of weary feet
Into the promised land.

"I crossed the plains when I was 7 years old," said a sweet-faced woman, a little beyond the middle age, "and I think what stands out in bold relief against that stretch of soft, shifting sand, is my poor little feet. Yes, I walked a greater part of the way. I guess, Mother would rub and soothe away the weariness of my tiny ankles after prayers were said, and I soon became lost in healthy, childish sleep. Bright and early the following morning, I was always ready to start out on my day's tramp, again. One rise I distinctly remember, however. Mother piled me into the wagon with the baby who was asleep. As we crawled along, in the dust and heat, the oxen, together with those of the entire train, suddenly snuffed water, and naturally stampeded. Away we whirled, helter-skelter, pelvis-first, bumpety-bump! Boding and pilvies flew in every direction; like a tiny pebble I was bounced up and down, and shaken up generally, but I managed to hold to the baby and the side of the wagon till we came to an abrupt pause in mid stream. It was my poor arms that needed attention that night. Remember, mother!"

THE DRESSY TYPES OF AUTO HAT.

Motoring hats that retain along with their usefulness a certain grace in design without which a hat becomes a misnomer, are difficult to obtain. The accompanying model shows a toque, however, that solves the problem in a bewitching manner. It is made of pink straw trimmed in front with two pink rosebud catanachs outlined with black platted satin ribbon. Two pairs of black wings laid flat to the crown upon either side lend character. The ties are of pink ribbon. A big black chiffon veil is worn with this dainty little motorist confection, a copy of which is an easy task for any one to accomplish.
