COUNTERFEITING NOBILITY.
AN AMERICAN GIRL AT THE LATE
ROYAL WEDDING.
 Caroline Hastings, an American girl, writes from London to the New York Sun to tell how she saw the royal wedding, and what a jolly thing it was.
 She didn't have an invitation, but she set her Yankee wits to work, and got along just as well as if she had half a dozen of them. Of course, she says, I must go alone, and I dared not speak of it except to mamma's maid.
A QUICK-WITTED FRENCH GIRL.
 Who was delighted at my conceit, and did her best to help me carry it out.
 We arose very early yesterday morning, and Marie dressed me in my lovely new rose-colored silk with court train and pannier, trimmed with point. I helped myself to mamma's great soli-itaires and locket. Marie did wonders with my long blonde hair, and if I do say it, who shouldn't say it, I looked as well, and was dressed as well as the average young ladies I saw on that eventful day. I hesitated whether to wear the pink, or the lovely white silk with silver stars, and pale blue velvet over-dress, with my pearls, but feared the latter might be trying in broad daylight; for even in smoky London the sun shone out in an unusual manner for the grand occasion. Suffice it to say when I stepped into the handsomest carriage that Marie could procure (for papa left me plenty of money, to have a good time while he was away, little thinking where I should bring up,) I was entirely satisfied with my appearance; and if mamma had gone, she would have looked forty times better than the old Queen in her black satin dress and her bare neck and arms.
WE WENT EARLY TO WINDSOR:
 My carriage fell into line. The guide eyed us rather sharply as we passed the gates, but seeing a sprightly blonde, in pink silk, point lace, and diamonds, with a modest looking maid in attendance, bowed, and suffered us to pass on.
 It was past their comprehensions that a young girl, attended by a single servant woman, without an invitation, would dare enter the sacred inclosure. I now began to feel fearfully nervous, as I had not formed the least plan for carrying out my bold designs, when, just as I alighted, a party of gentleman of the clan of Campbell were passing, and, with my most winning smile, I addressed one of them, a pleasant green looking Highlander, in full uniform, saying:
 "Excuse me, sir, but I am separated from my party and would like an escort into the chapel."
 "Certainly," said the good natured fellow, and gave me his arm. "Your name, me lady," said the Scott.
 "Lady Constance Percy," said I, unblushing.
 "O, yes! Of the Duchess' family?"
 and nothing could exceed his polite, respectful manner.
HOW SHE GOES OUT.
 As the retinue left the chapel I knew my time had come to escape before I was detected. So I gave a scream of delight and sprang away from my Highlander (whom I hope to meet again and thank for his courtesy.) I exclaimed: "Why, there's my father! Excuse me; a thousand thanks," and gathering up my train, I went pell-mell, between lords and ladies, peers, and duchesses, regardless of their astonishment, and despite all the proprieties of the occasion, and remember nothing more until Marie seized me, hustled me into the carriage, more dead than alive, pulled down the blinds, drew out a bottle of wine, and held me in her faithful arms to our lodgings; and now I cannot express to you my delight at my success in witnessing the royal marriage.
BE CAREFUL.—Great care should be exercised by parents and others to keep everything of a poisonous or injurious nature as much as possible beyond the reach of little children. An instance of a child, at Ogden, having accidentally swallowed a quantity of lye was alluded to in yesterday's News. A similar case occurred in this city on Wednesday, with a child of Brother Walter E. Dodge, of St.
 George. It appears that a box of liquid lye had been laid on a shelf and the child reached up and pulled it over, spilling the contents of the box over the lower part of its face, and its clothing. The tongue and throat of the little one were much injured and the front of the clothing completely burned from its body.
