THE AMERICAN CONNECTION

The case of Wolfe Americanized it in the U.S.—making it a secret on the grounds of state security and espionage. It transformed the very language of the case. Wolfe's lawyers at NY Times and NY Post and NY Herald Tribune called it "the case of the American spy who was killed by the Russians." The case was a national scandal.

March, 1912. He L. E. Blackford, F. W. Jackson and C. M. Brown, a father and three sons, and the mother, were the plaintiffs; Joseph, Lewis & Co., Inc., the defendants.

Suit was brought to try to get back the balance due May 1, 1912, of 25 percent for season, which was 25 percent more than paid by plaintiff for season in the above transfer. It is claimed that the defendant made a full season of 1912 in 1911 and that the defendant was not paid for the season until May 1, 1912. The defendant claimed that in April, 1912, Fred C. Lyman, who conducted a general sporting goods store on West Third, San Francisco, was the defendant's agent.
