

MILLIONAIRE FORGIVES

HIS ELOPING SON

Married French Maid and Wine Back
Father's Favor by Coaching

That all Pittsburgh millionaires are not members of the class so unpleasantly familiar to newspaper readers, is shown by the case of young John Alton Moorhead, John K. Moorhead, father of the young fellow, is a millionaire whose wealth commands respect even in the smoky towns where dollars are as thick as the clouds in the air; and when John, Jr., married his mother's pretty French maid about two years ago, the old man was promptly and properly angry, as any rich father ought to be under the circumstances. John, Jr., had not been a saint, by any means, but the worst that could be charged him was a disposition to reduce the stability of his intoxicants. His mother, who went on record as stating that the marriage of Harry Thaw to Evelyn Nesbit was an outrage, looked her husband up in his displeasure, and John, Jr., and his bride were forbidden the Moorhead mansion. Just then John, Jr., proceeded to show the stuff that was in him. He had a wife to support, and he took the first employment offered, after first undergoing the Keely cure to get himself toned up. He became the coach for the Western University of Pennsylvania football team at $1,200 per annum, and stuck to his job for a year. So well did he do his work that the football team in a recent game administered a decisive defeat to its great rival, the State College team. John, Sr., saw that game and learned that his cast-off son deserved the honors of victory. He sent for John, Jr., who had not bothered him in any way since they had parted, and offered reconciliation. John, Jr., accepted, on the understanding that his wife was to receive full recognition, and now he is to go to work with his salary in his father's steel mill. What his mother thinks of the peace treaty is not known.
