EVENING NEWS.

Monday, July 3, 1876.

Correspondence.

Revolutionary Elements in the United States.

COUNCIL BLUFFS, Iowa, June 24th, 1876.

Editor Deseret News:

The history of the western hemisphere is one of special Providences. Its own past can alone indicate its future. The historical experiences of the Eastern World are too foreign for that purpose.

The Jaredites, a very numerous and highly civilized people who inhabited North America for many centuries after the flood, destroyed each other by civil wars until not a germ was left for the re-development of empire. For this the annals of the world furnish no parallel.

The second wave of population which spread over the entire continent consisted of two great divisions, a white and a colored people. After a struggle of nearly a thousand years the former was destroyed by the latter—another anomaly in history.

The discovery of America by Europeans brought the religions, traditions, social customs, civil organizations and martial energies of two hemispheres into collision. It again inaugurated a contest of races, the aboriginal colored race proving the weaker of the two.

It would seem that the aggressive energies of the old world should have assimilated the institutions of the new to its own, but in reality the western has become a hemisphere of republics in antagonism to the monarchial governments of the eastern.

Was it not a special Providence that the leading one in this family of republics should have been the only offshoot of the Protestant reformation, and an embodiment of the progressive principles it developed? That it should be composed of such a great variety of religious creeds, of social customs, of sectional interests, and of civil organizations, and civil liberty, religious toleration and a spirit of compromise should have been primary conditions of its growth and development? That in the early stages of its growth extraneous pressure was almost constantly brought to bear on these heterogeneous elements to force them into cohesion, that the world, for the first time, might witness an affiliation of religious and political interests on a scale of sufficient magnitude to change the current of its affairs, and open up a new era to be characterized by man's redemption from despotic rule?

Aggression and conquest were for once ignored in the formation of a great nation. Our country is the spontaneous growth, on a new soil, of the best element the old world could furnish, nourished by some of the most exalted sentiments of humanity.

Mutual aggression and recrimination are the persistent enemies of popular institutions. They are antagonisms which can never assimilate. When one portion of our citizens assert their right to judge of the religious or moral condition of their neighbors, without reference to constitutional guarantees, it becomes an act of aggression which, if unchecked, becomes a precedent for anarchy and the rule of popular prejudice regardless of law.

Only on the most liberal principles could thirteen independent States, with their sectional interests, with their great diversity of religious sentiments and standards of morality, have succeeded in organizing a general government. This mixing of the varied elements of Christianity together, seems the only way in which a free government could have been originated from the materials of the old world. Had the colonies developed a dominant religion, might would doubtless have asserted its right of absolute rule, and the liberal principles of the present century would have been still waiting an opportunity to assert their adaptation to the wants of human progress.

The right remained with the individual States to regulate their internal affairs within constitutional limits. The general government assumed the responsibility of protecting American citizens against the aggressions of State authorities and the oppressive results of popular excitements, or its guarantees of liberty and equality are worthless.

When the abolition furore of the Northern States made their judgment of the moral and religious status of the slaveholder a means of forcing the slavery question into politics, it forced the slaveholder into defensive measures, and created a sectional antagonism which should have forever lain dormant. No plan for the abolition of slavery could well have been worse than an aggressive one.

Such acts are only illustrations of the motto that "might makes right." They are but one remove from an appeal to arms. The disastrous consequences which have followed the aggressional policy of the north in dealing with the slavery question are a forcible illustration of these platitudes.

When popular opinion forces special proscriptive legislation it is a direct blow at the vitality of our institutions.

For some forty years after the adoption of the Constitution appearances indicated that the religious intolerance which had characterized European civilization since the advent of scholastic theology had found its natural grave in the wilds of the western world, and that the great American republic would prove equal to its divine mission of illustrating the principle that man in a national capacity is capable of self-government.

The persistent attempt of the American people for forty years to force a solution of the "Mormon" problem is one of the strongest illustrations of the fact that they have inherited much of the intolerant spirit of their fathers.

JAMES A. LITTLE.

HON. S. S. FENN.—The course of this gentleman in the contest with Tom Bennett for the seat in the House has been manly and wholly honorable throughout. He relied solely upon the facts in the case and an honest Congress to do him justice. He has won no fight, because there was none to win—the case was too plain. But that he and his friends have been subjected to no little annoyance by the daring rascalities of Bennett and his tools, there can be no doubt. Bennett started in to be delegate through fair or foul means, and failing in the former he left nothing undone to accomplish his aims by the latter, and resorted to the most contemptible tricks of thievery to carry out his purpose. For the first time in fifteen years honest Congressmen have been elected, and justice was done in every contested case that came before them, and Bennett of course was kicked out. It is a source of extreme gratification to know that Mr. Fenn and the people of this Territory have not been defrauded of their rights, and a still greater pleasure the fact that fraud in election matters will no longer be countenanced by Congress.—Idaho World.
