The tall Oaks Ames, with a bouquet in his button-hole, should have led it, bearing a banner with the inscription: "I have placed what I will do in your good to us."

The bland and guileless Colfax, with smiling face, should have borne a banner, stating: "My income was so small and from such certain sources that I could not have received so large sum without remembering it." A piece of tape on the left arm, in memory of the departed Nesbitt, with whom he came so near taking ten years to make him very effective and interesting.

Baldwin, and his son-in-law, arm in arm, carrying a flag attesting the benevolence and generosity of the father-in-law, would have done much to have made the men in the procession as that numerous class in every community. Now that the Credit Mobilier investigation is over, General Dodge, the lost Pleiad, might have been interested in the idea of a procession, and take his place in the procession, with those majestic coal-tails which have been his only visible parts for sometime past.

Hancock, Giddings, and the field and the two Pattisons might have closed this section, marching three abreast, with certificates of good moral character pinned upon their breasts, and signed by Ben Butler, and men who God made mad.

The men that were in this division should have been a band playing the Rogue's March, and behind it Pomeroy should have been assigned a place and a banner bearing a full-length portrait of "Old Sam," his hand resting on a package of $7,000 to take to his friend Page, which he forgot to give Page when he had his interview with him the day before, relative to starting a National Bank in Salt Lake.

Gen. O. O. Howard should have marched behind him, covering his generous back with baldric coats of the whitewash. Caldwell should have had a place here also, with a band playing overture to the Kellogg, himself, and Judge Sherman, with his remarkable collection of letters to the New York Stock Exchange. Then Brother Harlan, in tears and anguish in arm with Brother Newman, might have carried a small-white banner, showing how he had left Dunn's checks in his pockets, and the motto, "If I thot it came from the Union Pacific Company I would have returned it." As beautiful a summary of the past, the Chopping down claim, Tom Murphy with the Custom-House flag, the cottage by the Sea, the Secur ghangs, the Pacific Mail, the Postmaster, and the Orleans Postmaster, and the State Treasury defaulter, should have been represented by their immediate friends. Bringing up the rear of this unique division should have been the soldiers who were packed valises in hand, and the army of lobbyists, male and female. The last feature of all should have been the foreigner, who makes his final grab at the United States Treasury, $5,000 each, because it is expensive to live in Washington. We submit that such features as these would have been of extreme value in the inauguration-day procession, and would have added to its variety and gorgeousness. It would have given the unsuspecting foreigner a clearer and more truthful glimpse of the real condition of things in Washington, and would have added new lustre to the inauguration of the President, whose cash value has advanced one hundred per cent. within the past three days. We must be contented, however, to accept the artistic delineations of flags, the glitter of processions, and the dazzling charms of the ball, in lieu of these, we console ourselves with the thought that this is a great and glorious country.
