Thrashing Himself for His Own Follies.

The theory of impartial justice, so beautiful in itself, the foundation of all good government, and the best security for human happiness, seldom receives exemplification at the hands of man. This may arise, perhaps, from the fact that it looks too much like infirmity upon the jurisdiction, and a higher power, to weigh out the decree only according to merit. At all events, society has not fallen into the way of impartial administration, and when the exception arises it proves the rule by its very uniqueness. The fact is, that in the following are the names of an honorable member of the City Government, though a reason for his connection with anything of the nature of justice does not appear until near the close of the annexed narrative:

There is a resident of one of the northern wards whose faith in corporal punishment is unbounded, and who exemplifies when occasion offers, the theory of impartial justice. He has been taught that the punishment of the present mitigates the punishment of the future, and, in proportion as he suffers here below for his sins, will be exempt at the time of final judgment. But, when his human belief, he is not exempt from the ordinary weaknesses of the human race, and his vulnerable point is his stomach, for which alcoholic liquors have a strong attraction. Ordinarily he is steady and industrious, working at his trade of carpenter, to the satisfaction of those by whom he is employed. But, periodically, he decides to "take up" with liquid stimulants in too strong a way, and a week or more of carousing, a general suspension of work, and the squandering of many a hard-earned dollar. There is no stopping half-way. The fever must run its course. The man finally comes, and with the return of reason, the victim decides upon a settlement with himself for his past excesses. The expression, "I'm vexed enough to cry," is not an infrequent one with those of the softer sex, and is generally followed by the opening of the ocular flood-gates and a downright "good cry." But when this intemperate carpenter remarks, "I'm bad enough to be licked," we would hardly presume that he is intended to signify corporal punishment upon himself. Yet such is the fact. He has considered the matter, and knows that his sin merits a painful reward, and he prefers taking it now to waiting when the results of his intemperance may be more serious. He immediately pronounced judgment upon himself, and decided that the court was that he confine himself, within the limit of his own house, and there administer to himself a beating, such as was commensurate with the enormity of his sin. Being a judge, and a fair one, there was little need to say proceedings, and plans for carrying out the order of the court were set on foot at once. He procured a stick a trifle smaller than a base ball club, and went to work at himself. The blows fell thick and fast, keeping time to his abusive remarks. The first protestations that he was "a goose," "a fool," and "an ass." But he plied his cudgel with vigor, lending encouragement to himself by such expressions as, "You will, you will." "Get drunk again? Just try it on once." "I'll show you a trick or two, you set." Finally the scene became monotonous to his wife and as she appeared no hope of cessation she ran to the neighbors to get assistance to stop her husband in his abuse to himself. It was only when the question of his moral agency, he was dragged to the scene of action. The executioner was well-nigh tired out, while the subject was in a state of complete collapse. He had not confined his blows to any particular locality, and while his extremities did not show the effects, except through their apparent lameness, his head was cut and contused in various places.

The sentence of the court was declared enforced, and when questioned as to why he had taken this method of meting out justice to himself, stated that he knew his deserved all he got, and it was only through his own painful experience that he hoped to learn how to do right. He was unable to comprehend any judgment, and to his view, and announced his belief in the efficacy of corporal punishment by saying, "If I get drunk, I must get licked; and if I lick myself, it is better for me than the end." St. Louis Globe Democrat.
