In Women's World.

Although Mrs. Nelson denies that the Pechoe is her own invention, she is willing to confess that her liking for this oval dessert is quite sufficient authority for the use of her name. To make this dish properly, as it is called by the Volins, the first Volins, in this case, the people must first be "taught." This is done by putting a mixture of kirsh and maraschino over it and setting the liquor on fire. When the fruit has been cooked sufficiently, it is covered with vanilla ice-cream in a circle of crushed raspberries. The effect is extremely dainty.

A WHOLESOME PHILOSOPHY.

Absolute honesty and a definite will offer produce better results without unusual intellectual gifts or opportunity than the keenest intellect can attain without these moral qualities. It would be an easy thing to quote cases of noted men and women in whom defects of character have practically nullified the most conspicuous intellectual gifts.

A philosophy of life is not what we think about life, but the convictions which govern our actions. It has well been called the working hypothesis of life. Since well-directed power is the measure of success, it is within the reach of every human being.

Philosophy is not a great or small and despair will disappear, like the morning mist before the sun. Your part is not to expend your nervous force in cynical criticism, but in the high obligation to build on whatever foundation of conviction you may possess.—Laura Drake Gill in the June Delinctor.

Long Summer separations between husband and wife are unwise temporary divorces that leave a long trail of sorrow, grief and misunderstanding. They do not actually wreck home and happiness, but they are an unnecessary risk, "padding a boat," a foolish experiment that may over turn and swamp it.

When one member of the home firm takes a long solitary vacation and the other stays at home in loneliness, Cupid, though blind, sees trouble ahead. With two who love each other the temporary separation may be the thin edge of a wedge, or it may be a permanent part. These solo vacations force each into a new environment in which the other has no part; they lessen the sweetness of mutual dependence; they break the continuity of love; they create a constant feeling of loss; they make it easier for each to face life's problems alone instead of hand-in-hand.

The regular annual exodus of the wife, because she has a restless desire to get away somewhere, because she has friends who insist on her accompanying them, or because she fears the neighbors will think she cannot afford to go away—these are the forms of voluntary separation for the time being, and sometimes even prove a short cut from matrimony to alimony.

The theory that husband and wife should be separated occasionally so that the more is a dangerous doctrine. Vacations with each other may be now miniature honeymoons, bringing refreshment to both, but long vacations from each other are what the insurance companies term "extra-hazardous risks."—William George Jordan in the June Delinctor.

THE CORRECT EVENING DRESS.

The low-necked gown is the only correct dress for evening wear, says Mrs. M. R. E. Sullivan.

It is now correct to dress for dinner in decollete or semi-decollete, whether we dine at home or out, later in the evening going on to the formal reception, the theater, the opera or the ball, says Mrs. Osborn in the June Delinctor. Thus, at last, do we cease to draw absurd distinctions between formal dress for different evening entertainments.

This sensible custom has extended amazingly during the past winter. It would at least seem that at this season of the year, our women would appreciate the value of the low-necked evening dress. The fashions—Barymore originally set the style—some time since began to wear collared dresses even in the daytime. This custom is becoming more and more general, and the new program will be collared dresses for morning, semi-decollete for afternoon, decollete for evening.

The hue and cry so often raised against innovation—that the average woman can't afford it—need not be heard in this instance. There is nothing more attractive for summer wear than the gown of inexpensive lawn or muslin.

The materials are the shiest and coolest. The skirts are long all round, the sleeves are short, the bodice is among the styles of decollete.

There is no economy in wearing last winter's elaborate gown of heavy silk or satin. Thin frocks for summer evening wear are correct. It is the poor woman's golden opportunity to dress as well as does the rich woman.

A TALL, regal-looking woman entered a South Temple car one morning, and took a seat near a young business woman—a widow——in one of our stores, with whom she was well acquainted.

"Good morning," said the young woman in a tone so bright and cheery, that the regal one remarked:

"Are you as happy as all that?"

"As what?"

"As the ring of your voice would imply?"

"Yes, I am very happy, this morning—my little boy is better; he's been very ill, you know, and mother and I held grave fears for a few days. I am so relieved this morning, I want to shout."

"I am glad to hear of his improvement, even though I did not know he was ill. I almost envy you your fears and anxiety, as it means happiness and a longing to shout in the end. I often wish I had something to shout over, the days are so hum-drum. Are you contented, too?"

"Oh, yes; the baby keeps me contented."

The brave little woman stepped off the car to ply her daily task with a light heart, while the regal one went further down the street to attend a sale—not so much that she needed things, but having neither children nor work to occupy her hands and brain, she must kill time.

PART SECOND.

"Who's mamma is so?"

"Nobody's mamma. And the tall regal-looking woman bent down in her pride to pat the golden curls on an infant's head.

"I want to be somebody's little girl," lisped Golden Curls, gazing up at the regal one with a look of yearning.

"You are somebody's little girl, now," said the regal one. "There's the kind home-mother, and then, look at all these little playmates."

But Golden Curls only shook her head, for she could not see it that way, and said:

"Sit down, please."

"Sit down? But I haven't time." The child persisted, the regal one finally allowed herself to be led to a chair.

"Take me on one lap." "Oh, but my child! Well, let me see your hands, first. Now, don't touch my collar."

"A won't." The child nestled; she almost purred.

"No little dirl?"

"No." "No little boy?"

"Me be one little dirl?"

The regal one was silent. The child wondered, and repeated:

"Me be one little dirl; me do home wif on."

"Not today," setting Golden Curls down. "Now, go and play."

"Answer day?" The child would not give up. The woman eyed her with a look of scorn.

"Me be dood, please!" Sufficeit pleading for tears, but—

"Then if you are good, go, now, and walk away." The child clung to the cold, silver skirt.

"Take me wif on; be my pretty mamma," she wailed. The regal one unclasped the tiny, clinging hands, and walked away.

Here was that woman's opportunity to possess the happiness and contentment she longed for that morning on the car, but it passed her by, or rather she passed it by.

QUEEN OF SPAIN INVITES AMERICAN WOMAN.

Special Correspondence.

LONDON, May 8.—Mrs. Adair has received a personal invitation from the queen of Spain to visit her in June. That among her majesty's many friends in England she should choose an American woman to be the first recipient of such a signal honor is rather significant. It will cause much heart-burning and jealousy among aristocratic Englishwomen.

Baroness Bunsen, who is linked by fate with that of King Alfonso, Mrs. Adair had been for some years on terms of intimacy with her. But so far as ties of friendship go, there are several ties. Englishwomen who have found claims to her consideration, and might perhaps reasonably expect that precedence should be shown them on account of their rank. Why, then, does her majesty's first choice fall on the American woman? I think it is because in a court atmosphere most American women, and Mrs. Adair, especially, still preserve an air of naturalness. They can appreciate the social triumph it involves without being dazzled and flustered by the attentions of royalty. They have been trained to regard the occupants of thrones as belonging to a superior order of creation. They look upon them as human, like themselves, and treat them as such.

Now at the court of Spain there is more ceremonious etiquette and fawning flattery than surrounds any other of the seats of the mighty in Europe. The young queen finds it a very tedious. She has kicked over the traces here and there, but she can make little headway in the heavy barriers of tradition. She seeks the relief of genuine human companionship. So she chooses from among all her friends Mrs. Adair as the woman in whom she will find what she wants. Mrs. Adair is good-natured, vivacious, unspoiled, and carries with her everywhere, something of the breeziness and freedom of her own Texan ranch. She is the last woman in the world to be awed by royalty, and that is one of the reasons why royalty likes her.

SAVAGES WHO LIVE TO GET DRUNK.

Special Correspondence.

PARIS, May 8.—French government explorers, who have just returned from a trip to fix up the boundary lines between the French Congo and the German colony of Cameroon, report the discovery of a savage tribe, the Tchokwe, whose existence seems to be to get gloriously drunk.

They have mastered the art without any assistance from the government. In the report made to the government, Lieut. George relates how, with an escort of tirailleurs, he arrived at one of the native villages during a particularly happy period of general sobriety. He had much trouble in securing huts for himself and his men, because it was considered contrary to native etiquette to interrupt a native in his work. He was obliged to wait until the natives had finished their work, and then he was allowed to enter.

Later in the day the chief called upon the lieutenant, and proposed, by way of appropriately winding up the festivities and amusing his guests, that his men should fight the French soldiers. The lieutenant explained to him that Frenchmen did not regard fighting as fun. That seemed to astonish the chief. However, he hospitably deferred to his guest's feelings in the matter. But a light he was bound to have, and he promptly made arrangements for one among his own people. The liveliest kind of a shindy followed. In less than a quarter of an hour a score of the dusky combatants were killed. The chief himself was among the first to fall.

As a result of the expedition there will soon be complete amity between France and Germany, as to the boundary line between the two colonies. The natives themselves can scarcely be regarded as desirable neighbors and much of their territory is not worth fighting over.
