NOMINATIONS when the State of Deleware was reached there was an immediate outburst of cheers. After the uproar had subsided, Mr. George Gray, of Deleware, came to the platform and addressed the convention. He said he had been instructed to present the name of a man worthy to receive the nomination. He said he did so under nomination. He said he did so under the realizing sense of great responsibility, and relying upon the convention to act so that the great opportunity which God himself, he reverentially believed, had given them, should not pass away unimproved. The republican nomination had flung defiance into the face of American manhood, and had shocked the consciences of the best men in that party. Such a nomination as Blaine's was a sign of the decadence in that party. Such a nomination as Blaine's was a sign of the decadence of that great party, and not a sign of increasing strength. The democracy called for a candidate who had been tried in the balance and never found wanting. The democracy demanded a statesman whose wisdom and experience were known. It demanded a leader whose chivairic courage would never falter, and who could and would bring to the dust the "Plumed Enght" of false pretense and of personal dishonor. It demanded a man of private character which would defy the malignant tongue of slander. It demanded a man who should be in his public and private character the very antithesis This powder never varies. A marvel of purity, strength and wholesomeness. mouths, was THOS. F. BAYARD, [Loud cheers,] Mr. Bayard as a candilate would make no mistake. His name would still the voice of the Nation. He would carry every doubtful State, and would make some republi-can States doubtful, Enthusiasm would take the place of apathy, and would grow and still grow as the leaves were growing, until the dreary November was made ripe and glorious by the peans of democratic victory. [Loud cheers ]

When the State of Indiana was called Mr. Hendricks of that State came to the platform amid loud adplause. He said that the people demanded a change in the management of official affairs and that the convention would execute the purpose in the election of a President. He believed that the nominee of this convention would become the chosen President of the United States, the first inaugurated bemocratic President in twenty-four years. Icheers.] He spoke of the official corruptions of the Republican party and referred to Secretary Chandlers's recent testimony before a Senate committee, in which he said that the defisications in one of his bureaus would not exceed $63,000, and yet four years ago an administration had gone down because of a defalcation of $80,000. In regard to civil service reform, he said there were men of ability in the public service, and he would not ask that they should be driven out of office. None others but such should be When the State of Indiana was called When the State of Indiana was called Mr. Hendricks of that State came to the platform amid loud adplause. None others but such should be continued. None but the fittest men should be in the service. Beferring to the foreign policy of the Government, he said it would be a beautiful spectacle if the Bepublic, so strong, so sure, should lead the nations in a movement for permanent peace, and for the relief of the people everywhere from standing armies and from wasterul war. He then came down to the main subject of his speech, and suggested for the consideration of the convention a citizen of the State of Indiana. Refer by permission to David James, Salt

JOSEPH E. M'DONALD.

[Coeers.] He sketched M. McDonald's carver, and declared that if he warp in the White House no. man who would go to see him there would find fault with the candid, frank manner of his seception. He did not speak for himself alone, or for McDonald alone, but for the prear State of Indians, which had instructed her delegates to present Mr. McDonald's name in this great convention. No matter where the Democratic andidate for the Fresiden of Irid, indiana had been always from election to election from convention to convention, that they must take care, he would say by way of iliustration, of New York. Laughter an applause.] Mr. McDonald was a man of cood judgment and of high character, and his name was presented by a great convention of McDonald. They would present, they said, a platform which would appeal to the sober judgment of the people. They also needed a man whose antecedents were known to all men, and whick a natecedents were known to all men, and whote a natecedents were known to all men, and whote a natecedents were known to all men, and whote a natecedents were known to all men, and which constituted a satisfactory answer to all reasonable objective woo all public questions could be found without a search warrant, and determined without a minquisition. The nomination of Mr. Bayard was seconded by Hooker of Mi-sissippi.
When the State of New York was called there was a good deal of cheering and waving of hats and handker-chiefs on the part principally of spectators in the galleries. At 3:55 p. m. Mr. Lockwood of New York, came up. Mr. Lockwood of New York, came up to the platform to put in nomination

MR. CLEVELAND.

He said that the responsibility which he felt was made greater when he re-membered that the richest honors of American history had been made up from the records of democratic administrations. He remembered that the outrage of 1870 was still unavenged ontrage of 1870 was still unavenged. No man had a greater respect than himself for the honored names presented to the convention, but the world was moving and new men were coming to the front. Three years ago he had the honor in the city of Buffalo to present the name of the same gentleman for the office of mayor. Without hesitation the name of Grover Cleveland had been accepted as the

He was a man to whom dishonor was unknown. He was one made up of greatness, who had a victorious birthright in his name alone. It might be urged that he came from the wrong side of the Ohio River, but if the statute of limitations was ever to run that plea out, it ought to begin now. (Cheers.) He contrasted Carlisle and Blaine, the first as being a man on whom even God had seemed to set his seal; the other leprous with a accusations and covered and tattoed all over. (Applause.) When the forces of Oliver Cromwell were lying on their arms awaiting battle, they frequently engaged in angry disputation concerning matters of fact, but when the order to how the veto was injurious to the

how the veto was injurious to the working classes. He declared that the State of New York could not be carried by Mr. Cleveland, not because of any from Old Ironsides that Prince Rapert was in front, they forgot their differences and had no thought but victory, until success crowned the arms of the Protector. So when the chairman of the convention would shortly give the democratic hosts the word to charge all along the line, they would, laying aside all differences and discussions and bickerings and strife, charge the republican party front and rear, and if they had John G. Carlisie at the head of the column, they would win such a victory as was won by the Puritan forces of Cromwell at Naseby and Marston Moor. (Cheers.)

When the State of Massachusetts was called their action was watched with much curiosity. Cheers and hisses were about equally balanced, but it was announced by Mr. Abbott that Massachusetts had no nomination to make at this time.

The nomination of Mr. Bayard was executive power to veto bills that were conceived in the interest of lawere conceived in the interest of la-bor; a man whose hair had grown gray in the service of the country. (He meant Mr. Thurman of Ohio, but he didn't name him). Why, he asked, should the democratic party take a plunge in the dark, and subject the fu-ture fortunes of the party to the haz-ard of a lottery? Why should they thrust their hands into the bag and draw out a number which might turn, out to be a regenerator for the party, a Moses, or whose name might be a false prophet, whom it would be much bet-ter not to have discovered. He warnter not to have discovered. He warnter not to have discovered. He warned the convention against a repetition of that insanity, that folly, that fatality which had affected the democratic party for the past twenty ye rs. He hoped that all those burning questions would be left to be settled by the State of New York itself, and that the convention would pause before it invaded that unwilling State, and he appealed to the convention to ratify the nomination of that grand old democrat, Allen G. Thurman, of Ohio. E. K. Apgar, of New York, was next heard in a short speech seconding the nomination of Cleveland.

A delegate inquired whether this was a State convention at Albany or a national convention at Chicago. The chairman gave the comforting speech from the New York delegation, and so Mr. Appar went on with his A motion to suspend the order of business was carried.

secones and asks that that name be given to the independent and democratic to votes of the country; to the young men of the country, and to the new blood of the country. [Cheers.]

NOT MUCH FOR CREDETORS.-The Not Much for Creditors.—Ine agent of a Baltimore house who was sent to a town in Virginia the other day to see what he could save for his firm out of a bad failure, found the merchant perfectly ready to explain everything. Said he:

"I lay it all to speculation. I went into iron and iron went down. I hought a coal mine, but it didn't pan into iron and iron went down. I bought a coal mine, but it didn't pan out. I took futures in wheat, and wheat went right down like a stone."
"Wouldn't it have been better had you attended to your legitimate business?" quietly asked the agent.
"No, sir—no, sir! I had scarcely got into debt to the amount of $8,000 before I discovered that I was not fit for a mercantile pursuit. If I can get some one to back me for about $20,000 I shall go into the Jersey cattle business. Here's the showing, sir: Liabilities, $14,250; assets, a character for honesty unsuilied."
