A Clerical Foe for the Death Penalty.

At the Shawmut Congregational church, corner of Tremont and Brookline streets, yesterday forenoon, the pastor, Rev. E. B. Webb, D. D., preached to a very large congregation on the subject of "Capital Punishment," taking for his text the words: "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed," for in the image of God made man; Genesis ix. 6. He first noticed the connection in which the text stands. The flood had subsided and everything had been given into man's hands. With the sight of blood man would henceforth be familiar, so, with the permission to take animal life, God permitted man to take the life of man. But from this time forward the murderer was to be put to death.

A writer of some eminence has said: "It was undoubtedly wise in God to do as he did with Cain, but it was not wise to continue the experiment." Of course the murderer must possess the elements of responsibility, and must be clearly proved to remain but one thing for the government to do, and that is to take the life of him who has taken life. Yet some persons will say, that is the Old Testament, and the whole spirit and tenor of the New Testament is against capital punishment. But the Old and the New Testament, rightly interpreted, are one, and teach one and the same lesson. It is forbidden by the Savior to bring to trial and punishment, persons guilty of the most heinous and darkest crimes, if that is what the text "Resist not evil" means, then we should not be allowed to bring to punishment those who commit any lesser crime. The Savior teaches us private vengeance and gentleness and public justice, and Paul's teachings are identical. The individual is commanded to give way to the higher power, which is the government. "Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord," and the agency through which he punishes the criminal is the civil government. Such is the Scripture and such the Divine justice, and it can be denied only by denying the Bible entirely. Every man has the right of self-defense, and as he gives up the right to the government, that ought to have a powerful and many-sided right to protect him. Government is in the interest of a people, and is put there by him who made the soul. Constitutions and laws are government, but only an agreement as to how this heaven-born right shall develop and limit and regulate itself. The work of the legislator is expository, not creative, and merely expresses the divine will as to civil law. Now, the general opinion of the people is that the murderer should be punished by death. In new communities we see this instinct asserted, and where the law is too weak to punish the evildoer, men take it into their own hands to do so, but that in this Old Commonwealth, with all our police, a vigilance committee would be a good thing, and I know that if the murderer of Mabel Condit stood with a noose about his neck at the foot of yonder tower, and the other end of the rope was in the hands of a tender and loving mother, of the South End, he would hang as high as Haman, as quickly and as justly [sensation and subdued applause]. The execution of the death penalty is both expedient and merciful. It is expedient, because nothing is so dear to man as life and nothing so dreadful as death; so that no penalty will prevent murder as well as the death penalty. It is merciful; for when you look one of these fellows in the eye, and they know, you must business, they are not going to risk their necks. So I say the execution of the death penalty is merciful. It is merciful to the criminal as well as to society. If one looks to the safety of society, it is both wise and benevolent. Let the State execute the execution of this penalty swift and certain. Let the law be written in letters that may be seen by the wicked and the abandoned and the lawless every day: "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed."—Boston Globe, June 7.
