THE HARD TIMES.

If there is any one whose memory can carry him back to the outbreak of the panic in 1873, it must be very depressing to him to contrast the steady duration of the hard times with the jaunty assurance which looked on the panic as a passing cloud. It was held to be the part of a wise man and of a good citizen to argue that the panic represented merely a disturbed condition of the public mind, and not a depleted condition of the public pocket; there were even those who thought that the hallucination could be alleviated if the newspapers would only refrain from publishing sensational accounts or using startling head lines, while all men agreed that this was the greatest, most glorious, prosperous country under the sun, and that no matter what follies we committed, or what extravagances we indulged in, we were certain to be spared the punishments which have lain in wait for national folly and extravagance since civilization began.

It has been nearly three years since the rotten fabric of worthless credits and wild-cat enterprises commenced to crack and to crumble, and in that long history there has not been a single day in which the situation has mended. Every day we have gone to bed poorer than we waked up, and have waked up poorer than we went to bed. The industries connected with iron, on which the first burden of the disaster fell, were slow to realize that a contraction of business was inevitable; but they have learned that lower wages and diminished profits were merely a part of the sacrifice exacted of them. The industries of cotton, which rank next in public estimation as the employers of skilled industry, have carried on a useless struggle against a similar contraction in their wages and profits and in their productions. The value of real property in cities and in farms, which represents the accumulated wealth and savings of the Nation, has undergone a shrinkage fairly represented by one-third of its value three years ago. In every department of industry, in every form of investment, this Nation has known a loss and a decline, unrelieved by a single gleam of prosperity, and to-day there is no prudent business man who will say that he sees a prospect of relief, no political economist who can say that the panic which was looked on as a passing cloud has exhausted itself.

And yet, to judge from the popular tone of comment, it looks as though we were as willing to deceive ourselves about the remedy for all this sad misfortune as we have been to deceive ourselves about the cause. Even now, when there can be no doubt about the cause, and when the history of the destruction of value and of the loss of capital is plainly written in every day's record, from April, 1861, to September, 1873, we pretend to wonder what can be the cause of the hard times, and of the general depreciation. During four years we were constantly engaged in a thorough and systematic work of destruction. The strong hands and the clear heads that should have been at work in the harvest and in the counting-room increasing and storing up the additions with which God rewards labor, were in the battle-field and on the march wasting, burning, consuming, destroying. From one side of the fight alone $4,000,000,000, one-fourth of the wealth with which we went into the war, was spent in making payments for the work of destruction; no estimate has been made of the destruction we did not pay for, or of the loss to our industry, by the withdrawal of so many hands from production. The cost to the other side was surely no less; when we add them both together, the estimate is appalling. But by a strange fatality, by an inconceivable blindness, instead of reckoning up this destruction as a loss, we have acted as if it represented rather an enrichment of the country, and every paper dollar and every bond which had been issued as an evidence of property destroyed was considered as an evidence of property created. Instead of realizing that we had less to spend, we followed the delusive phantom of credit as far as it would lead us, built railroads beyond the power of patrons to pay for, furnaces for iron which was not needed, mills for fabrics we could not afford to wear, and now we are finding out by harsh experience that building a furnace or railroad that will not pay comes next to destroying a railroad or a mill that does pay.

We ought to be learning this truth, but we are not; we still cling to the delusion that our misfortunes came without a cause, and we blindly hope that they will pass away without cause. Instead of realizing that the property lost and wasted and fooled away is as absolutely gone as if it had never existed, instead of realizing that it can be replaced only by hard work and strict economy, we hope that the evils which were gathering during ten years may be dissipated in a day; we flattered ourselves that if we would spend five or six millions of dollars in a show and call it the Centennial year we would not feel the loss of the five or six thousand millions which represent our impoverishment. That hope has failed us, and now the sagacious politician takes the public by the button-hole and says that all that is needed is a change of administration, that a change in Washington will restore public confidence, etc., etc. Now do not seek to emulate the politicians and to make party capital out of a pure question of political economy; even the stupidest politician might be expected to know that no matter which way the election turns it will represent the popular confidence, and we say that is a very unfavorable indication, it is a proof of very abject imbecility, when the toleration of a public hearing is accorded to such nonsense. A nation which spends more money for whiskey than all that it pays to the tax-gatherer—Federal, State and National—may be very ready to believe that it will start on the high road to wealth because Smith controls the appointments instead of Jones; but those whose public position gives them a public responsibility ought to know better. The cheapest capital for a demagogue is a virtuous profession, to be used as a catch-word; it is not a bad sign that demagogues are compelled to assume virtuous professions, but it is a very bad sign when the people put faith in them, and it is especially hard when real grievances and heavy losses, such as are summed up in the words "hard times," are expected to disappear before the cheap promises of a political quack. Those who really desire to form a just appreciation of the condition of the country, would do well not to mix up politics with it; and those who do not wish to deceive themselves about the future will do well not to base any hopes on relief coming from politicians.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.
