CONTESTED ELECTION

TERRITORY OF UTAH.

Geo. R. Maxwell vs. Geo. Q. Cannon.

Argument of Halbert E. Paine, Counsel for Sitting Member.

(Before the Committee on Elections of the House of Representatives of the United States, Washington, D. C., 1874.)

Among those who debated this motion was George Grenville. I preceed to quote at some length from his speech (16 Hansard, 559) for two reasons. In the first place, it embraces an exhaustive and masterly statement of the real character of the power to admit, reject, and expel members secured to the House of Commons by the unwritten constitution of England; and then it also contains an able and complete statement and discussion of the earlier case of Robt. Walpole, expelled for an infamous crime in January, 1712, and admitted a few months afterwards, without objection to a new Parliament.

"But it has been urged," said Mr. Grenville, "whatever may be the case in point of power in regard to the several articles contained in this question, whether taken together as an accumulated and complicated charge, or considered separately and distinctly, yet this House must necessarily be the judges whether any member of their own is or is not a fit person to sit amongst them; and it has been argued that if the last Parliament thought him unfit, the present has certainly an equal right to adjudge that he is so. It has been asked what merit he has had since that time to recommend him, and to induce the present Parliament to think him a properer man to sit amongst them than he was to sit among their predecessors? This would, indeed, be a conclusive argument, if we really had that discretionary power of excluding all those whom we think proper upon which it is founded. But we have no such general authority vested in us, nor is there a single precedent where we have pretended to exercise it. Whenever this House has expelled any member, it has invariably assigned some particular offense as the reason for such expulsion. By the fundamental principles of this constitution, the right of judging upon the general propriety or unfitness of their representatives is entrusted with the electors, and, when chosen, this House can only exclude or expel them for some disability, or for some specific offense alleged and proved. If it were otherwise, we should, in fact, elect ourselves, instead of being chosen by our respective constituents.

"If I had been one of the electors for the county of Middlesex I should have shown by my vote the opinion which I entertained with regard to the conduct and character of Mr. Wilkes, and to the propriety of choosing him a knight of the shire for that county. I had not only a right, but it would have been my duty to have manifested that opinion. But when he is chosen and returned hither, my duty is widely different. We are now acting in our judicial capacity, and are therefore to found the judgment which we are to give, not upon our wishes and inclinations, not upon our private belief or arbitrary opinions, but upon specific facts alleged and proved according to the established rules and course of our proceedings. When we are to act as judges, we are not to assume the characters of legislators any more than the Court of King's Bench. . . . we were bound to reverse Mr. Wilkes's outlawry if they found any irregularity in it, though possibly they were convinced in their private opinions that it would have been more beneficial to the State to have confirmed it. If we depart from this principle, and allow ourselves a latitude in questions of this nature; if we are to admit those whom we think most proper and expel those whom we think most improper, to what lengths will not this doctrine carry us? There never was a Parliament chosen into which there were not some persons elected whom the greater part of the House thought unworthy of that honor—I speak of former Parliaments—and it becomes us to be careful that posterity should not speak still worse of us. Let me suppose for a moment that this were true to a certain degree even in the present Parliament, and that it were carried still further, from party prejudice or from motives less defensible. This would, indeed, be the sure means of purging the House effectually from all ill humors within these walls, and of dispersing them at the same time throughout every corner of the kingdom. But if this summary mode of reasoning was really meant to be adopted, there was certainly no occasion for our sitting four or five days and nights together to decide a question which might as well have been determined in so many minutes. I cannot, therefore, bring myself to think that any gentleman will avow the proposition to this extent.

"But perhaps some may wish to shelter themselves under the other part of the argument, and may contend that a man who has been expelled by a former House of Commons cannot, at least in the judgment of those who concurred in that sentence, be deemed a proper person to sit in the present Parliament, unless he has some pardon to plead or some merit to cancel his former offenses. They will find upon examination that this doctrine is almost as untenable as the other. Votes of censure, and even commitments, by either House of Parliament, acting in that capacity only, determine, as is well known, with the session. There are, indeed, some instances where, in matters of contempt and refusal to submit to the orders of the House, the proceeding has been taken up again in a following session. But to transfer an expulsion from one Parliament, and by this means to establish a perpetual incapacity in the party so expelled, which must be the consequence of it—as this objection will hold equally strong in any future Parliament as in the present—this, I say, would be contrary to all precedent and example, and inconsistent with the spirit of the Constitution. I could cite many precedents to prove the first part of my assertion, but one alone will be sufficient for my purpose, because that is so signal and so memorable in all as to render any confirmation or enforcement of it quite unnecessary. In quoting this precedent I beg leave to say, that I do not intend to throw any imputation on any person whatever. I neither mean to acquit or condemn those who were parties to it, but merely to state the fact as it appears from your journals, and then to submit the result of it to the judgment of those who hear me.
