MOHAIR SHOPPING SUIT FOR SPRING.

Double and triple box plaits are extensively employed for skirts of simply tailored suits. These are usually untrimmed, being finished about the bottom with a rather deep hem and at the waist with a princess or attached skirt. Coats are slightly more than hip length, with half-fitting backs and straight fronts, either double breasted or single, and opening over a waistcoat which in many instances is of silk or satin matching the turned-over collar and turned-back cuffs. Wide armholes, sleeves, like those pictured, are still strongly in evidence. They extend to the wrist or to the elbow.

VOILE ELABORATELY BRAIDED.

As a material for tailored costumes of dressy persuasion, voile is finding much use among the higher class models. Its best skirt development is the pleated model simply trimmed with bandings or tucks. If the coat is trimmed, as it is in this instance, with handsome embroideries accomplished with soutache applied on satin, the skirt is elaborated with a matching band. Coats are of waist or hip length, and more or less elaborate with short sleeves and pretty vests, into which is often introduced a contrasting color. Taupe is the shade of this suit, with self-colored trimming, and a taupe straw hat in Babette model is trimmed with plisse Val and violets.
